The Unrivaled Illustrated Family Paper.

Frank Leslie's

CHIMNEY CORNER.

THE Popular American Family Journal, Story Paper and Home Friend.

Its Literary and Artistic Attractions are brilliant, and novelties are presented in constant succession; in best suits the wants of families.

As a Story Paper it is without a successful rival; the department of fiction contains serial novels by the most popular writers in this country, and wherever our language is spoken; but in addition to this, the information conveyed in every number is of the highest interest, and given in the most attractive form to win readers among old and young.

The Serial Novels, Short Stories, Sketches of Foreign Life and Travel, etc., are contributed by such popular writers as—John Habberton, Author of "Helen's Babies"; S. Robinson, Author of "That Mother-in-Law of Mine," "The Janitor's Daughter," etc.; Ella W. Pierce; Christian Reid; Mrs. Victoria Victor, Author of "The Dead Secret"; M. T. Caldor; Frank Lee Benedict; J. W. De Forest; Corry Carew, Author of "Belle Bodkin of Ballybodkin"; Prof. H. C. De Mille, etc., etc., etc.

Biography, all that is wonderful in Art and Nature, Anecdotes of celebrated personages, Science divested of technicality, Poetry, etc., etc., are embraced in the contents of each number, and all accompanied by Illustrations executed in the most refined style.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is a paper of high character, as its unvarying popularity surely attests.

Each Number contains sixteen pages of reading matter, with eight pages of admirably executed illustrations.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to Royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony, a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

IT IS WARRANTED TO

CURE NERVOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE BILIOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE NEURALGIA IN 5 MINUTES!!
PREVENT FALLING HAIR AND BALDNESS!!
CURE DANDRUFF & DISEASES OF THE SCALP!!
PROMPTLY ARRESTS PREMATURE GRAYNESS!!
MAKES THE HAIR GROW LONG & GLOSSY!!
IMMEDIATELY SOOTHES THE WEARY BRAIN!!
MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

IT RARELY FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, WHERE THE GLANDS and FOLLICLES ARE NOT TOTALLY DESTROYED.

"I cheerfully testify to the merits of Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush. It cures my headaches within a few minutes. I am so pleased with it I purchased another for my wife. It is an excellent Hair Brush, well worth the price, aside from its curative powers."
JAS. B. CHAPMAN.

Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents:—I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. C. Bridgeman, D.D."

DR. GEO. A. SCOTT—Dear Sir: Permit me to add the testimony of my wife to that of the many others who have been benefited by the use of your Electric Brush. She has for years been a sufferer from Neuralgia in an acute form, but since I obtained for her one of your Brushes, she has experienced entire relief. Please accept her sincere thanks.
HENRY BARNETT.

DISSOLVING VIEWS IN POLITICS.

THERE are undoubtedly a good many evils incident to the machinery of politics, of popular elections, and, indeed, of government itself, but, considered as a means to the attainment of an end, no means has been found so effective for the preservation and promotion of good government as the method of government by parties, with the right of free discussion conceded to all citizens, preliminary to a "full vote, a free ballot and a fair count" at the end of the electoral contest.

This method of free debate and of trial by the scrutiny of the ballot-box is an excellent means for eliminating the extraneous, irrelevant and trivial issues with which it is always sought by the baser sort of politicians to complicate the processes and the results of a popular election. Much dust is thrown in the eyes of the people during every struggle on the public arena, but even through the din and smoke of the passionate and noisy strife it is not very difficult for "the average voter" to apprehend the paramount and the substantial questions which are really at stake. The foam and driftwood of an animated canvass are very conspicuous at the beginning and at the end of each Presidential campaign. At the beginning of the quadrennial assize there is a vigilant and critical searching into the political "records" and personal characters of the respective candidates, with a view to riddling the former and blackening the latter; and at the end of the assize there is much extemporizing of "cries" intended to startle and of "roorbacks" intended to deceive the stolid and the simple voter.

At the beginning of the recent canvass, for instance, some almost forgotten reflections on the character of General Garfield, and some previously unknown incidents in the career of General Hancock, were suddenly drawn from their obscurity into "the sunlight of publicity," or, rather, let us say, into the artificial calcium-light of a sharp, unsparing and prejudiced criticism. And now, at the close of the canvass, these hard-worked inculpations are ready to be stowed away in the lumber-rooms and dust-bins to which the refuse and chaff of former political struggles have long since been relegated by the muse of history. With the conflict over and past, it will soon be admitted on all hands that the credit of a long and honorable political career should be counted ample enough to cancel the aspersions which have been brought against General Garfield, while Republicans will soon be as prompt as Democrats to denounce the slanders brought against General Hancock for the "murder of Mrs. Surratt," for alleged "revolutionary designs" meditated at the last Presidential count, and for having once been engaged in an "oil speculation"!

The close of every political campaign is always signalized by some more or less astonishing coups de théâtre meant to strike the public eye and frighten the people from their propriety. An alleged conversation between General Grant and a Methodist divine, in which the latter represented that the former had spoken in the most disparaging terms of General Hancock, was widely circulated by the Republicans, on the eve of the October elections, as an electioneering card well calculated to impress the minds of the soldier class among our voters. But whatever influence, if any, it may have had on the unthinking in that class of minds, was, we imagine, more than counteracted by the repulsion which it excited in the breast of all thoughtful and candid men, who, being anxious to preserve their respect for the soldierly virtues alike of General Grant and of General Hancock, could not look with complacency on such a flagrant disregard of social ethics in the interest of party.

And during the last few days of the canvass there were some attempts on the part of the Democrats to catch the popular ear by startling cries directed to the exposure of alleged machinations against the purity of the elective franchise in Florida; and even a spurious letter was forged by some underling in the Democratic service for the purpose of exploding the ground under the feet of General Garfield in the last decisive moments of the Presidential conflict, when the tug of battle expresses itself in the pantings and shriekings of the frenzied belligerents. We need not say that such weapons as these are pointless for the purposes of offense, and those who use them find, to their cost, that in holding their swords by the blade and not by the handle, they are only giving wounds to themselves while giving a handle to their enemies. The publication of another fac-simile of a manuscript letter, alleged to have been written by General Weaver, and which was also found to be a forgery, does but serve to show that the forged letter mill can be as industriously worked by Democrats for campaign purposes as the old Southern "outrage mill" used to be worked by Republicans on the eve of each Presidential election. The retailers of both will soon be glad to see them banished into the tomb of the Capulets.

Meanwhile, through all this medley of politics and this hurly-burly of passion the elements of a deliberate public opinion were slowly forming. "The shallows murmur but the deeps are still," said Mr. Conkling, quoting from the verse of Raleigh in the Chicago Republican Convention. "All heights are calculated," said General Garfield, in the same assembly, "from the level of the sea, and not from the agitations on its surface." The politicians of both sides, and Mr. Conkling among them, have done their utmost to excite hoarse murmurs in the "shallows" of public debate, but the great deep of calm public opinion will soon close over these mud volcanoes of the press and hustings without leaving a bubble to mark the spot where they went down.

A new set of emotions will now come to preoccupy the public mind. The eyes of men will be turned to the future and not to the past. The successful party will be called to answer the solemn question, "What will you do with it," now that you are charged with the government of this great people for the next four years? The answer to this question has been, in too great a measure, evaded by the leaders of each of the two competing political organizations. They have been each anxious to win with the least possible assumption of definite obligations in the way of economic reform or of administrative amendment. But these obligations will soon become definite under the pressure of forces which do not admit of faltering in promise or of vacillation in action. Far better will be the fate of the party which is remitted to "the cool, sequestered vales" of the opposition than of the party which is charged with the responsibility of the Government without being equal to the burdens of duty implied by that exalted position. The position is full of trial because it is full of peril and of opportunity.

GREAT FARMS AND GREAT CITIES.

MUCH has lately been said about the revolution in agriculture accomplished within a few years by the success of the great wheat farms of the West, whose productiveness, compared with the expenses of cultivation, has been such as to make competition on the part of farmers in the older States, and even in some parts of Europe—particularly in England—hopeless in the near future, if it has not already become so. When the wheat of Minnesota and Dakota can be unloaded in Liverpool at prices below the minimum cost of production in England, and this not occasionally, but, owing to constantly improving facilities for shipment and transport, practically as the rule, the change may be well termed a revolution, the consequences of which can scarcely fail to be of the most far-reaching character. The most immediate of these would appear to be that a great impulse will be given to the movement, already in progress, of the rural population towards the great cities and manufacturing towns, accompanied by the partial suspension, if not the total cessation, of farming on the comparatively small scale that has been the rule in the past. Already many New England farms are relapsing into woodland because it is no longer possible to keep them under cultivation to advantage. In England, notwithstanding the added cost of ocean freight, a similar condition of things is imminent.

A great change in the relative proportions of urban and rural population, it is feared by some, would be socially disastrous. Great cities have been said to be "great sores." Cowper's dictum that "God made the country and man made the town" well expresses a widespread sentiment as to the humanizing tendencies of rural life compared with those of cities. But a little consideration will show that there is not much ground for fear either as to the permanent suspension of agriculture in the less favored region or as to the consequences anticipated from it. The effect of the competition of the great farms cannot last more than a generation. Within thirty to thirty-five years the population of the United States will have increased to such an extent that all that is now surplus of the great wheat crop will be required for consumption at home, and long before that time arrives the amount that can be spared for export will have diminished from year to year. There are those now living who may see the last of our exports of wheat and of all kinds of produce, if the progress of this country in population shall equal its promise and bear any probable proportion to the progress of the past. The less productive lands will then again come under cultivation here as well as in Europe. The present condition of things is only transitional, not normal. The prices of wheat and of every kind of agricultural produce will again rise with the rapidly increasing demand, and lead to the careful cultivation of every acre of land that, by the aid of the most scientific farming, can be made productive.

If, in the meantime, the great cities and manufacturing towns shall have received great accessions, it is to be hoped this will not be for evil. It should not be doubtful that great cities do not necessarily tend to the degradation of their population, but that, on the contrary, they are essential to the advancement and growth of civilization. There are possibilities of mental and moral elevation in cities that are quite unknown in secluded rural districts. It may be said, in fact, that aggregation is civilization and segregation is barbarism. Gathered into great masses, population falls inevitably into organization, and the most minute division of labor becomes practicable, with all its increased productiveness. With population scattered at wide intervals, every man has to do everything for himself and does nothing well. The only modification of the condition of the inhabitants of remote rural districts arises from such imperfect communication as they possess with cities and towns. Absolutely cut off, they would inevitably sink into a semi-savage condition. The first successes of Christianity were in the great cities; the populations scattered in the regions remote from them being practically inaccessible, remained for centuries in the unenlightened condition of their ancestors, and the term Pagan, originally meaning only an inhabitant of the country in distinction from an inhabitant of a city, came to signify one who had not become a Christian. The English farm laborer, representing a class for many generations kept apart from the mental activity of urban populations, is an illustration of the degrading influence of segregation. So also is the "clay-eater" of the South. In the old times, when roads were few and bad and communication with towns difficult and costly, men had to live mainly on the soil whence their subsistence was drawn. In the present age, of which one of the most remarkable characteristics is the enormously increased facilities of transport, only those need live on the soil who are actually required for its cultivation, and these are, with constantly improving methods, implements and economies, and especially the vast areas brought under one management, comparatively few. May it not be concluded that the diminishing population of the rural districts and the unprecedented growth of great cities in our day are not to be lamented as fraught with evil, but that the movement is rather an evidence of advancing civilization, and that its tendency is largely, if not altogether, beneficial to humanity.

THE ONEIDA COMMUNITY.

THE days of the Oneida Community are evidently numbered. When, a few months ago, in deference to a tidal wave of public indignation which threatened to overwhelm them, its members consented to abandon for the time their principal tenet of complex marriage, as one for which society was not yet sufficiently advanced, they yielded its strongest point; and in their recent action of dividing the property hitherto held by the whole community into shares to be held by a joint stock company, we see the deliberate renunciation of another fundamental doctrine. Upon these two points the whole structure of their association—the whole fabric of their polity—was founded.

The Oneida Community is one of the latest, and, in certain respects, the most successful, of all the experiments which grew out of that general ferment of ideas which agitated all Europe a hundred years ago, and led, on that continent, to the French Revolution, and on this to numberless societies and associations in which the idea of a community of goods was a more or less fundamental principle. It is difficult to realize how widespread was the belief that there was a radical error in the existing ideas of tenure of property, and how immense an amount of thought and energy was brought to bear upon the problem how to substitute a social and co-operative state for the competitive one which was and is the existing order of society. It was the consideration of this problem which gave rise to such societies as the Dunkers, Rappites and Shakers, and that later on, within the memory of many yet living, produced the great renaissance of Socialism under Owen and Fourier and their disciples. The years between 1826 and 1847 saw the birth of no fewer than seventy four associations dedicated to the solving of social problems. The well-known Brook Farm Association, from the rare superiority of its members, was by far the most brilliant and noteworthy of all these, and its existence was prolonged to the unusual extent of six years. Of the others, few lived beyond the second year; all died heavily in debt, and none realized its hope of in any adequate degree influencing public sentiment, although for a time the leaders of public thought, both in the Democratic and Whig parties, had been sensibly attracted, the one by the doctrines of Owen, the other by the tenets of Fourier.

The Oneida Community, which, in a certain sense, rose upon the ruins of the former experiments, having been founded in 1846, distinctly asserts itself to be the outgrowth, not of the socialist renaissance, but of the religious revivals which swept over this country in the years between 1830 and 1840. Not Owen and Fourier, but Nettleton and Finney, it claims as its spiritual fathers. In the words of its founder, Noyes, "Orthodoxy ripened into Perfectionism at New Haven, and Perfection produced the Oneida Community." That idea which, however they otherwise differed, lay at the root of both the Owen and the Fourier movements, "the enlargement of home, the extension of the family beyond the little man-and-wife circle to large corporations," is, in the Oneida system of doctrine, secondary and subordinate to the religious creed which, by some psychological legerdemain, has been evolved from the New Testament teachings. It is from these teachings, interpreted by the immediate inspiration with which they claim to be endowed, that they have deduced that doctrine of community of persons out of which arises their practice of complex marriage, and from which they trace their second and minor tenet of community of goods, which, in other such associations, had hitherto held the foremost place.

It is this claim to advanced thought and superior religious light which constitutes their peculiar offense. When a community of people take a higher ground than the mere pecuniary welfare of society, and base their action upon the most exalted of motives, claiming for it the highest sanction, we have a right to demand from them the most exalted purity of life, the noblest self-renunciation for the common weal. When, therefore, they are found to be leading a life compared with which Mormonism is purity itself, it is no wonder that the indifference or curiosity with which other such experiments are regarded should give place to a sentiment of universal execration, and should lead to decided and efficient action. The wonder is, indeed, that the Oneida Community has been permitted to live so long in the face of the positively upward moral tendencies of the age.

It can scarcely be a matter of surprise that, so soon after being forced to yield the cardinal point in their creed, they should find it necessary to reconstruct their theory of property. Other societies have attained a good measure of prosperity upon the basis of a community of goods; but the Oneida Community, in claiming that its social theories were founded upon a religious creed, had only to prove the rottenness of the one to see the ruin of the other.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE Eastern Question is still unsettled. Dulcigno has not been transferred to the Montenegrins, and it seems likely that further delays will occur. Whether the Sultan is really doing his best to carry out the terms of the Treaty of Berlin or not is difficult to say; but Riza Pasha who commands the Turkish forces around Dulcigno, has apparently done all in his power to enable the Montenegrins to take possession of that town.

The fall of the Greek Ministry, which immediately followed the meeting of the Chambers, was a matter of much surprise. M. Comoundouros, who has succeeded M. Tricoupis as Prime Minister held the same position until last January, when he was defeated on a financial question. At that time there was much dissatisfaction with his conduct during the Turco-Russian war. A remark which Lord Beaconsfield made at the Congress of Berlin that "Greece had one eye upon Great Britain and another upon Russia," was quoted against him; and certain privileges granted by him to foreign bankers, which had failed to lift Greek finance out of the slough into which it has fallen, were mentioned as evidence of his incapacity. It is unlikely that Greece will take any aggressive steps for some time to come. It will require several months to prepare for war, and money, the backbone of warfare, is sadly wanting. M. Comoundouros, however, said, in reply to M. Tricoupis, that his policy was not to delay preparations for taking over the territory assigned to Greece by the Berlin Conference until the Great Powers should undertake to enforce their decision, but rather to carry it out by their own action. It is almost certain that France, Germany and Austria will take no further active part in enforcing the Berlin Treaty.

The Irish difficulty is growing every day on the hands of the Government. Already there are whispers of the resignation of Chief Secretary Forster, whose humane recommendation that the constabulary should use buckshot in place of bullets, only earned him ridicule and the sobriquet of "Buckshot" Forster. The rumor of Mr. Forster's resignation, however, has been contradicted, and is probably a mere canard. At the same time, the Government seems to be in earnest, and is proceeding, with an unusual resolution, to carry out the programme of repression. The first consequence of its action is the open declaration of sympathy with the Land League made by the more conservative Irish members of the House of Commons. Justin McCarthy and Frank Hugh O'Donnell have both sent in formal requests to be elected to membership. On the other hand, two or three representatives of Irish constituencies have seized the opportunity to withdraw from their dangerous attempt to navigate the whirlpool of Home Rule. At the last meeting of the League the applications of Messrs. McCarthy and O'Donnell were formally received, and a reporter of the Ulster Gazette, a Conservative newspaper, was ordered to withdraw. The greatest caution is displayed by the Leaguers in admitting representatives of the Press to their weekly meetings, so acute is the apprehension that a Government stenographer may be allowed an opportunity to take down treasonable and therefore actionable utterances. A resolution of the League calls on the Irish race throughout the world "to answer the coercive measures by resolute organization," and requests Mr. Michael Davitt to remain in America "for the purpose of directing the great responsive movements among the Irish people of the United States." The "great responsive movement" alluded to is an average weekly remittance of £1,500 from Irish American sympathizers with the Land League.

That the gentry of the disaffected districts entertain a reasonable fear of an immediate outbreak seems to have been shown by a meeting of the magistrates of the West Riding of Cork, which took place on Tuesday, Oct. 26th, under the presidency of Earl Cowper. Resolutions were passed in favor of the suspension of the habeas corpus and requesting troops to be sent immediately to Bandon, Bantry and Skibbereen. Between Templemore and Thurles a system of photo-telegraphy has been established by the military authorities. Secret signals are flashed from one point to the other all night, and the obvious conclusion is deduced that active operations are about to take place. The feeling in England is most hostile to the new Irish movement, and the sympathetic action of the Radical clubs of London, which are largely composed of Irishmen, is generally denounced. Meantime, the threatening of landlords goes on with increasing vigor. Viscount Cloncurry, a young nobleman who was supposed to enjoy, in an exceptional degree, the goodwill of his tenants, has received letters menacing him with the fate of Lord Mountmorres. Lord Hodilaun, who was raised to the peerage as a recognition of his generous contributions to the improvement and beautification of Dublin, and who used to be better known as Sir Arthur Guinness, has been compelled to request an escort of armed police. Lady Mountmorres, on returning to her residence after her husband's murder, was so persecuted by her tenants and the agents of the Land League that she had to leave Ireland in a state almost of penury. The Queen has put at her disposal a suite of apartments in Hampton Court Palace, an indulgence usually reserved for the widows of distinguished generals. These and other signs seem to point to an impending emeute under the leadership of Mr. Parnell and his co-leaguers, such as has been but too frequently incidental to the history of the Niobe of nations.

The French Chambers have been convoked by a Presidential decree for the 9th of November. The completion of the decrees against the religious communities will be postponed until after that date, and exciting debates will take place upon the whole question. The Ministry will then, probably, ask for a vote of confidence and the future policy of the Government upon that question will be guided by the strength or weakness which the Clerical Party can show. Another subject that will engage the attention of the Chambers immediately after their convocation will be the affair of General Cissey. The Government is openly charged with base ingratitude to a brave soldier who had served his country during a long life. Ivan de Worstyne, the journalist, whose articles upon Colonel Jung in the Gaulois caused the inquiry, has resigned his position on that newspaper, and it has been decided not to prosecute Cissey. It now appears that Jung's wife was constantly seen at the Ministry of War during General de Cissey's term of office, and that there are reasons for believing that she had access to his most private papers. She is a woman of great ability, and was remarkable for her beauty and chic. It is said that she was the original of the principal character in Sardou's play of "Dora," but her beauty and elegance have departed, and she has no longer her old influence over the susceptible statesmen of la belle France.

NEW YORK is not as well governed as it might be; but the municipal credit certainly shows that the financial administration is tolerably honest and efficient. Last week, $2,800,000 of four per cent. consolidated city and county bonds, redeemable in thirty years and liable to State taxation, were sold at 105. We cannot surely be going to the dogs financially when our monetary institutions eagerly purchase city four per cents. at a premium of five per cent.

Our exports of domestic produce continue to swell the balance of trade in our favor. The total export for the year, down to the 23d of October, reaches $342,831,636 against $286,195,665 for the same period of 1879—an increase of $56,635,971. As heretofore, the great bulk of the shipments are breadstuffs, provisions, cotton, and other agricultural products, but there are also considerable quantities of machinery, furniture, leather, domestics, and other manufactures for the West Indies, China, and the German ports, where our trade is steadily extending.

If land sales constitute a sign of prosperity, then the South is certainly prosperous. During the present year there have been sales of public lands in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Missouri and Mississippi amounting to $1,095,405, an increase of $573,379 over last year. A large part of this area was sold to small proprietors, black and white. Such sales register the individual prosperity of the laborer which has its outcome in small farms and peasant proprietors.

THE demands of ocean traffic are compelling constant additions to the carrying facilities of the great competitive lines. It is announced that the Cunard line has just concluded contracts for the construction of three powerful screw steamships for the transatlantic service, the largest of which is to be of steel, of 7,000 tons and 8,500-horse power. The other two will be of 5,000 tons and 4,500-horse power. The total of the steam tonnage now in the course of construction for the Cunard company amounts to 30,500 tons, and 32,500 horse power.

IT is said that in consequence of the increasing embarrassments of the Spanish Treasury, caused by the military expenditures in Cuba, a large reduction of the colonial army and navy expenses for the estimates of 1881 and 1882, and also an immediate repeal of the export and import duties on foreign flour, grain and other alimentary articles of consumption in Cuba, will be proposed to the Cortez. There seems to be at last a real determination on the part of the Spanish Government to deal intelligently and vigorously with the problem of government in the island which has suffered so much from maladministration.

OUR national finances are, to say the least, in better shape than it was supposed they would be one year ago. Then the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the receipts from customs for 1880 at $150,000,000. The forthcoming annual report of the Secretary will show that the receipts from customs were $186,522,064, being an increase of $36,522,065 over the estimate. The report will also show that the total receipts of the Government from all sources for the fiscal year 1880 were $333,526,610, being an increase of $45,526,610 beyond the amount estimated, leaving a surplus revenue of $85,883,653. Meanwhile, we have, in the last twelve months, paid $107,000,000 of the public debt, and have saved thereby $6,000,000 annually in interest.

THE drought which has prevailed throughout the Northern States during the late Summer and Autumn, has operated enormously to the detriment of industries which are dependent upon water power. This has been especially the case in New England, where, according to the Boston journals, the scarcity of water "affects all kinds of merchandise, restricting the demand, especially for raw materials. Cotton, woolen and paper mills are all running on short time." In Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, not a few important industries have been brought to a dead halt by the stoppage of the mills. The rainfall of last week brought some relief, but more copious rains will be necessary to the filling of the springs and streams which supply the motive power for the operation of thousands of factories and mills.

IN his testimony, the other day, before the Warren commission, General Grant said: "I wanted my orders obeyed, and I generally have them obeyed. I did not want officers who persisted in thinking for themselves and weighed the consequences before acting on the orders I gave." The whole story of General Grant's success, as the Commander of the Army of the Potomac, is told in these words. Up to the time that he came to the command of that magnificent army, it had signally failed to achieve what it was really capable of achieving, and the reason, undoubtedly, was found in the spirit of jealousy which so largely existed among the subordinate officers. Grant exacted obedience, weeded out all commanders in whom the feeling of loyalty to duty was not dominant to every other sentiment, and so, having secured unity and coherency, accomplished the results which any of his predecessors, enjoying a like vigorous support, might possibly have reached. It ought to be understood in all walks and pursuits in life that obedience never degrades, and that he who cannot obey promptly and without question, no matter in what relation or field of duty, will inevitably be overtaken by disaster and failure.

THE London Economist discusses, at some length, the subject of the enormous emigration to the United States and the relation which this ever-increasing volume of population sustains to our national wealth. After taking into consideration all the elements in the case, the Economist concludes: "If we place the average value as a capital-creating force of each immigrant at $1,000, we get as the actual or potential addition to the wealth of the country by such a body of immigration as that now taking place the enormous sum of $500,000,000 per annum. This estimate is not put forward with any claims to perfect accuracy; it is simply a rough calculation intended to bring home to the minds of those who may not have thoughtfully considered the subject some notion of the rapidity with which the United States are being enriched by the drafts they are making upon the population of the Old World. But it is some indication that we have not overstated the annual movement of wealth arising in this way that the United States Bureau of Statistics have estimated the growth of capital through immigration in the fifty years prior to 1871, when, of course, the influx was trifling to what it is now, and when, moreover, the quality of the immigrants was much below the average standard, at an average of $125,000,000 per annum."

THE Episcopal General Convention, recently held in New York, adopted a report strongly condemning church theatricals, lotteries, fairs, and other questionable methods now generally pursued for extracting money from worldly pockets. The language of the report was as follows:

"In the administration of their parishes and securing means for their maintenance they permit and countenance those things which the natural man loves and in which the young take most delight. Churches were once built by lotteries, but the moral sense of the community was at last offended and they were prohibited. Now theatricals, dances, suppers, and whatever else will draw money from the throng who love excitement and amusement, are presented as attractions for securing the means with which to carry on the Church's work. The committee believe these practices are destroying public respect for many teachers of our holy religion."

The justice and timeliness of this rebuke cannot be questioned. Many so-called modern church entertainments are simply theatrical performances and games of chance disguised under a thin veneer of morality, and there can be no doubt that they often exercise a pernicious influence upon the young and thoughtless. The Church can never lift its voice against worldly amusements with any real or lasting effect so long as it shelters under its own ægis practically the very thing it condemns in others.

WE referred last week to the revelations of bribery made before the British Parliamentary Committee which is charged with the investigation of the recent elections. Later disclosures show that Oxford is entitled to an odious pre-eminence in the matter of the corruption of the suffrage. The Conservative agent testifies that it cost his party about $40,000 to defeat Sir William Harcourt in May, $20,000 having been expended the previous month without effect. At the first election there was a tacit compact between the two parties that expenditures on each side should be limited to $10,000 and no bills should be issued; but when the contest got warm the bargain was repudiated, and "both sides fired bills at each other," as many as five sets of placards being issued in one day. His published accounts, he said, never had been correct, and he "juggled" items so as to save himself from a criminal prosecution. On election day he employed about 1,200 people and 1,075 conveyances; his side cast 2,730 votes! He admitted that the gain of 100 votes which defeated Sir William Harcourt was made by corruption, and that the difference between his published and actual expenditure went for bribes. The returning officers and the magistrates, he added, were corrupt. We do not wonder that these revelations have "startled" the influential and fashionable circles in which the offending parties move; nor are we surprised that the committee of inquiry has decided that Oxford shall be disfranchised. Corrupt as our elections often are, it is obvious that our English cousins have nothing to learn from us in that direction; if anything, we must, in fact, sit as learners at their feet.

THE last days of the political canvass just closed were marked by a vehemence and venom which were by no means creditable to the partisan journals and managers. This was especially the case in New York, where the contest over the municipal nominations became largely personal, and charges and accusations affecting the reputation of one candidate or other were handled to and fro with a cool malevolence scarcely ever equaled. All sorts of lying manifestoes, too, were issued by campaign committees with a view of influencing votes; and a stranger, judging us by what the newspapers said of the candidates for public office, would have concluded that we had not an ordinarily decent or honest man anywhere in nomination. This sort of thing may, perhaps, be necessarily inseparable from the heat of a campaign; but we are not yet prepared to believe that such is the fact, and hope still to see the day when our political campaigns shall be conducted with some regard to the ordinary decencies of life. Not that we would by any means exempt political parties and their candidates from the closest and most rigid scrutiny of their principles and record: men who allow themselves to become candidates for office have no ground of complaint when every act of their lives which serves to throw light upon their character and qualifications is closely investigated. But when their motives are lightly impeached, when idle rumors are treated as established facts, when honest mistakes are magnified into crimes, and when circumstances necessary to a clear judgment as to the real character of an act are purposely concealed, then there is ground for complaint and indignation. In a contest which stirs the feelings and arouses the prejudices of vast numbers of men, it cannot reasonably be expected that discussion will never be marred by passion; but surely we have a right to insist that the managers of a political campaign shall not designedly or knowingly lend themselves to the work of slander and detraction, or seek to carry their points by devices at war with every principle of morality and decency.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

MRS. GOULD, the cashier of the defunct Ladies' Deposit of Boston, has been released on $10,000 bail.

GENERAL TERRY proposes to send a scout named Allison to Sitting Bull's camp to negotiate a surrender.

THE resources of 2,000 national banks on the 1st of October last are officially reported at $2,105,786,625.

A FIRE at Lynn, Mass., on October 28th, destroyed a steam mill and some adjoining building, valued at $150,000.

A BILL has been introduced in the Vermont Legislature making women eligible for town superintendents and town clerks.

MRS. LINCOLN, widow of the late President, who arrived from Europe last week, has since been seriously ill at a hotel in New York City.

A PROPOSAL has been made in the Buenos Ayres Congress to grant a subsidy of $100,000 yearly to a line of steamers between Buenos Ayres and New York.

THE receipts of grain at this port on Thursday last were the largest ever recorded, aggregating 1,640,362 bushels, of which 637,204 was wheat and 782,400 corn.

THE Mobile Cotton Exchange has ratified the agreement made in New York on October 14th between the creditors of Nimble and the Commissioners of the city.

THE Ansonia Clock Works in Brooklyn were destroyed by fire October 27th, involving a loss of $500,000, and throwing 1,200 persons out of employment.

THE seventh annual convention of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union was held in Boston last week, with 87 delegates from various parts of the United States.

OVER 400 Italian laborers, employed on the Cape Cod Ship Canal, have returned to New York City destitute, having been unable to obtain their wages from the contractor.

A JOURNALIST named Kennard Philp was arrested in New York City last week for an alleged libel of General Garfield in connection with the forged "Chinese letter."

MR. THOMAS HUGHES is again in New York City en route for England. He will probably sail next week, after addressing a public meeting on the subject of co-operation.

SARAH BERNHARDT arrived at this port on Wednesday morning last, October 27th, and was warmly welcomed by her immediate friends. Her baggage filled two large express-wagons.

MR. CYRUS W. FIELD will sail early this month on a trip around the world, to last about a year. He was entertained by his friends at a farewell dinner at the Union League Club House, October 26th.

THE failure of C. Risley & Co., wholesale dealers in coffee and spices, in New York City, with liabilities of $500,000, was announced last week. The assets are estimated at $400,000. The failure is attributed to the depreciation and shrinkage in values and losses by other failures.

THE Mississippi River Commission have thoroughly inspected the plan adopted by the Bureau of Engineers for the improvement of the Upper Mississippi River, and in their report will approve the plan and urge that it be continued.

A RECEPTION to Lieutenant Schwatka, the Arctic explorer, was given by the American Geographical Society at Chickering Hall, in New York City, on October 28th. A number of relics of the Franklin exploring party were exhibited.

GENERAL HANCOCK was last week presented a fine Malacca cane with ferules of ivory and silver and a gold head engraved, suitably inscribed and studded with diamonds. The cane was made by Tiffany & Co., and voted to General Hancock at a church fair in Brooklyn.

THE Episcopal General Convention, before its adjournment last week, adopted a resolution urging a merciful but firm enforcement of the laws against polygamy. It also adopted an order that no prayers other than those contained in the Prayer Book shall be used by the clergy, and decided that a Missionary Bishop shall be appointed to the episcopate of every territory in the United States.

Foreign.

THE Pope has written to the Archbishop of Paris deploring the religious decrees and their application.

MME. ROZE-MAPLESON.

IT is ever a pleasing duty to utter the word "welcome," but when that word is the spontaneous outcome of an abiding sentiment, its gracious force is tenfold. In bidding Madame Marie Roze-Mapleson welcome after her too-prolonged absence from our shores, we use the word in its entirety, and whether as the artiste, the beautiful and gifted prima donna, or the winsome woman, we bid her welcome. Never was Marie Roze-Mapleson in more superb voice! The "gift of the gods" is bearing bounteous blossom, and, like some priceless cabinet wine, which improves in wondrous minor tones by time, the two years that have elapsed since Madame Mapleson went from us have but added a riper and more delicious flavor to her magnificent voice. The public will now have an opportunity of hearing the matchless prima donna in English opera. Madame Roze having made the English language a study, not only as regards speaking, but as regards singing, has so completely mastered it that her pronunciation is absolutely faultless. The idiotic libretti which usually accompany English versions of Italian opera have been done away with, and powerfully dramatic versions substituted, these under the supervision of that most astute of all modern playwrights, Mr. Dion Boucicault. In addition to hearing Madame Roze-Mapleson in "Aida," "William Tell," "Carmen," "The Bohemian Girl," "Faust," "The Huguenots," and other equally attractive operas, we shall have the latest phenomenal success, Boito's "Mefistofele," in which Madame Mapleson will create the powerful and combined rôle of Margherita and Helen of Troy. The gifted prima donna's marvelous rendering of Boito's boldly realistic composition is a treat such as the lovers of music fairly hunger for. We publish Madame Roze-Mapleson's portrait in this new-born rôle, and we cannot but envy the æsthetic ones of the Hub to whom it will be sung for the first time on the 13th inst.

GOING TO THE POLLS.

AMONG the many bizarre scenes consequent upon a national contest, that witnessed by one of our artists on a road through a pine wood in North Carolina was as quaint as it was ludicrous. A cart laden with Republican "darkies" was passing along to the polls, its occupants uttering party cries of defiance, mingled with shrieks of laughter, as they cast handbills of a taunting character to a number of Democratic "darkies" who were trudging in the same direction, but traveling on what is popularly known as "shank's" mare. At the head of the mule bearing the Republicans marched a consequential personage, carrying a tattered flag, and attired in a costume, part of which bespoke the military element. His grotesque airs of solemn importance would have made the fortune of the lowest of low comedians, while the gloom on the faces of the "gents as walked" imparted the strangest of contrasts to the expressions of those who were in the cart. How the old pine-trees rang with the jubilant shouts of the darkie swells!

What a gala night election night is with the genius of New York! What a fling they have! What ash barrel is safe from their omnivorous clutches? What piece of rickety furniture? From an early hour the bonfires commence, each fire having its own special set of clients, who strain every nerve to make it as brilliant and as lively as possible. Everything is pressed into the service. Unwise is the man who leaves his wagon by the sidewalk! Foolish the housewife who neglects to take in her tubs and wooden utensils! Election night is a free night, and the man or woman who would molest a boy for endeavoring to keep up its tone by the abstraction of a piece of plank would be unworthy the name of American!

VALUABLE STATISTICS.

AN English paper condenses the following facts from a book of universal statistics by Baron G. F. Kolb: Among the languages of civilized nations, English is the most widely spread. It is the mother-tongue of about 80,000,000 people; German of between 50,000,000 and 60,000,000; French of between 40,000,000 and 50,000,000; Spanish of 40,000,000; Italian of 28,000,000, and Russian of between 55,000,000 and 60,000,000. The general condition of the masses of a nation is the most valuable element in national progress or degeneracy; and Baron Kolb shows that the reproductive capital existing in the living generation far exceeds the value of all other capital. Every needless impediment to the development of this capital, and anything which tends to deteriorate the bodily condition of the population, is proved to be a squandering of a nation's wealth. Every advance made by a people in morality, in profitable and healthy employment and useful knowledge, brings it nearer to the ideal — the greatest natural tenure of life. Domestic virtue also tells favorably on the health and wealth of a population. Thus in Bavaria, out of 1,000 children born alive, there died, of legitimate children, 248 boys and 212 girls; of illegitimate, 361 boys and 342 girls. Out of 100 children suckled by their mothers, only 18.3 died during the first year; of those nursed by wet-nurses, 29.33 died; of those artificially fed, 60 died; of those brought up in institutions, 80 died in the 100. The influence of prosperity or poverty on mortality is also shown by Baron Kolb. Taking 1,000 well-to-do persons and another 1,000 of poor persons—after five years there remained alive of the prosperous, 943; of the poor, only 655. After 50 years there remained of the prosperous, 557; of the poor 283; at 70 years of age, there remained 235 of the prosperous, and of the poor, 65. The average length of life among the well-to-do was 50 years, and among the poor 32 years. The effects of professions and trades on mortality are great, the term of life varying from 65 years 11 months for clergymen, to 40 years and 10 months for lithographers and copper engravers. In England, according to the Census Office statistics, the duration of life has been found most defective among the steel workers, polishers and grinders; and next to these the life of the collier—that fearless delver in the bowels of the earth—is least secure, owing greatly, no doubt, to the occurrence of accidents in mines.

One of the most potent shorteners of life is the anxiety of providing for bare subsistence. The lack of sanitary conditions also shortens man's years. Idleness, as compared to intense industry, outweighs—prejudicially outweighs—all the advantages of ease and abundance. Of all countries in the world, England shows a pre-eminence in abstention from suicides, while in France they increase with advancing years. Taking 1,000 suicides which occurred in France, and dividing according to sex for each month, it is curious to note the effect of long and short days. In January, 68 men and 63 woman killed themselves; in February, 75 men and 70 women; in March, 84 men and 78 woman; in April 94 men and 93 women; in May, 96 men and 92 women; in June, 106 men and 110 women; in July, 99 men and 106 women; in August, 82 men and 106 women; in September, 74 men and 78 women; in October, 77 men and 99 women; in November, 61 men and 68 women, and in December, 62 men and 62 women were suicides. As Mr. Buckle argued, statistics show that there is no exercise of will, no act in the entire compass of men's dealings, which does not fall within the lines of an absolute regularity. Of all human actions, marriages seem to be most arbitrary, and out of the region of fixed laws. Yet the registers prove that it is especially in marriages the greatest steadiness and regularity obtains; taking three quinquennial periods, it will be found that the following proportions exist:

Widowers to spinsters.....	982	937	934
Widowers to widows 320		223	340

Marriages of men under 30 years of age to women of 60 and over occurred twice in the first period, and once in each of the others. Statistics prove that, in countries where consanguineous marriages are permitted, there are to be found a greater number of deaf-mutes and idiots than elsewhere.

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

CHAPTER IV.—FATHER BENWELL SITS.

ART has its trials as well as its triumphs. It is powerless to assert itself against the sordid interests of everyday life. The greatest book ever written, the finest picture ever painted, appeals in vain to minds preoccupied by selfish and secret cares. On entering Lord Loring's gallery, Father Benwell found but one person who was not looking at the pictures under false pretenses.

Innocent of all suspicion of the conflicting interests whose struggle now centred in himself, Romayne was carefully studying the picture which had been made the pretext for inviting him to the house. He had bowed to Stella, with a tranquil admiration of her beauty; he had shaken hands with Penrose, and had said some kind words to his future secretary—and then he had turned to the picture, as if Stella and Penrose had ceased from that moment to occupy his mind.

"In your place," he said, quietly, to Lord Loring, "I should not buy this work."

"Why not?"

"It seems to me to have the serious defect of the modern English school of painting. A total want of thought in the rendering of the subject, disguised under dexterous technical tricks of the brush. When you have seen one of that man's pictures, you have seen all. He manufactures—he doesn't paint."

Father Benwell came in while Romayne was speaking. He went through the ceremony of introduction to the master of Vange Abbey with perfect politeness, but a little absently. His mind was bent on putting his suspicion of Stella to the test of confirmation. Not waiting to be presented, he turned to her with the air of fatherly interest and chastened admiration, which he well knew how to assume in his intercourse with women.

"May I ask if you agree with Mr. Romayne's estimate of the picture," he said, in his gentlest tones.

She had heard of him and of his position in the house. It was quite needless for Lady Loring to whisper to her, "Father Benwell, my dear!" Her antipathy identified him as readily as her sympathy might have identified a man who had produced a favorable impression on her. "I have no pretension to be a critic," she answered, with frigid politeness. "I only know what I personally like or dislike."

The reply exactly answered Father Benwell's purpose. It diverted Romayne's attention from the picture to Stella. The priest had secured his opportunity of reading their faces while they were looking at each other.

"I think you have just stated the true motive for all criticism," Romayne said to Stella. "Whether we only express our opinions of pictures or books in the course of conversation, or whether we assert them at full length, with all the authority of print, we are really speaking, in either case, of what personally pleases or repels us. My poor opinion of that picture means that it says nothing to me. Does it say anything to you?"

He smiled gently as he put the question to her; but there was no betrayal of emotion in his eyes or in his voice. Relieved of anxiety, so far as Romayne was concerned, Father Benwell looked at Stella.

Steadily as she controlled herself, the confession of her heart's secret found its way into her face. The coldly composed expression which had confronted the priest when she spoke to him melted away softly under the influence of Romayne's voice and Romayne's look. Without any positive change of color, her delicate skin glowed faintly, as if it felt some animating inner warmth. Her eyes and lips brightened with a new vitality; her frail, elegant figure seemed insensibly to strengthen and expand, like the leaf of a flower under a favoring sunny air. When she answered Romayne (agreeing with him, it is needless to say), there was a tender persuasiveness in her tones, shyly inviting him still to speak to her and still to look at her, which would in itself have told Father Benwell the truth, even if he had not been in a position to see her face. Confirmed in his doubts of her, he looked with concealed suspicion at Lady Loring next. Sympathy with Stella was undisguisedly expressed to him in the honest blue eyes of Stella's faithful friend.

The discussion on the subject of the unfortunate picture was resumed by Lord Loring, who thought the opinions of Romayne and Stella needlessly severe. Lady Loring, as usual, agreed with her husband. While the general attention was occupied in this way, Father Benwell said a word to Penrose—thus far a silent listener to the discourse on art.

"Have you seen the famous portrait of the first Lady Loring, by Gainsborough?" he asked. Without waiting for a reply, he took Penrose by the arm and led him away to the picture, which had the additional merit, under present circumstances, of hanging at the other end of the gallery.

"How do you like Romayne?" Father Benwell put the question in low peremptory tones, evidently impatient for a reply.

"He interests me already," said Penrose. "He looks so ill and so sad, and he spoke to me so kindly——"

"In short," Father Benwell interposed, "Romayne has produced a favorable impression on you. Let us get on to the next thing. You must produce a favorable impression on Romayne."

Penrose sighed.

"With the best will to make myself agreeable to people whom I like," he said, sadly, "I seldom succeed. They used to tell me at Oxford that I was shy—and I am afraid that is against me. I wish I possessed some of your social advantages, Father!"

"Leave it to me, son. Are they still talking about the picture?"

"Yes."

"I have something more to say to you. Have you noticed the young lady?"

"I thought her beautiful—but she looks a little cold."

Father Benwell smiled.

"When you are as old as I am," he said, "you will not believe in appearances where women are concerned. Do you know what I think of her? Beautiful if you like—and dangerous as well."

"Dangerous? In what way?"

"This is for your private ear, Arthur. She is in love with Romayne. Wait a minute! And Lady Loring—unless I am entirely mistaken in what I observed—knows it and favors it. The beautiful Stella may be the destruction of all our hopes, unless we keep Romayne out of her way."

These words were whispered, with an earnestness and agitation which surprised Penrose. His superior's equanimity was not easily overthrown.

"Are you sure, Father, of what you say?" he asked.

"I am quite sure, or I should not have spoken."

"Do you think Mr. Romayne returns the feeling?"

"Not yet, luckily. You must use your first friendly influence over him—what is her name? Her surname, I mean."

"Eyrecourt. Miss Stella Eyrecourt."

"Very well. You must use your influence (when you are quite sure that it is an influence) to keep Mr. Romayne away from Miss Eyrecourt."

Penrose looked embarrassed.

"I am afraid I should scarcely know how to do that," he said. "But I should naturally, as his assistant, encourage him to keep to his studies."

Whatever Arthur's superior might privately think of Arthur's reply, he received it with outward indulgence. "That will come to the same thing," he said. "Besides, when I get the information I want—this is strictly between ourselves—I may be of some use in placing obstacles in the lady's way."

Penrose started. "Information!" he repeated. "What information?"

"Tell me something before I answer you," said Father Benwell. "How old do you take Miss Eyrecourt to be?"

"I am not a good judge in such matters. Between twenty and twenty-five, perhaps?"

"We will take her age at that estimate, Arthur. In former years I have had opportunities of studying women's characters in the confessional. Can you guess what my experience tells me of Miss Eyrecourt?"

"No, indeed?"

"A lady is not in love for the first time, when she is between twenty and twenty-five years old—that is my experience," said Father Benwell. "If I can find a person capable of informing me, I may make some valuable discoveries in the earlier history of Miss Eyrecourt's life. No more, now. We had better return to our friends."

CHAPTER V.—FATHER BENWELL MUSES.

THE group before the picture which had been the subject of dispute was broken up. In one part of the gallery Lady Loring and Stella were whispering together on a sofa. In another part Lord Loring was speaking privately to Romayne.

"Do you think you will like Mr. Penrose?" his lordship asked.

"Yes—so far as I can tell at present. He seems to be modest and intelligent."

"You are looking ill, my dear Romayne. Have you again heard the voice that haunts you?"

Romayne answered with evident reluctance. "I don't know why," he said, "but the dread of hearing it again has oppressed me all this morning. To tell you the truth, I came here in the hope that the change might relieve me."

"Has it done so?"

"Yes."

"Doesn't that suggest, my friend, that a greater change might be of use to you?"

"Don't ask me about it, Loring! I can go through my ordeal—but I hate speaking of it."

"Let us speak of something else, then," said Lord Loring. "What do you think of Miss Eyrecourt?"

"A very striking face; full of expression and character. Leonardo would have painted a noble portrait of her. But there is something in her manner——" He stopped, unwilling or unable to finish the sentence.

"Something you don't like?" Lord Loring suggested.

"No; something I don't quite understand. One doesn't expect to find any embarrassment in the manner of a well-bred woman. And yet she seemed to be embarrassed when she spoke to me. Perhaps I produced an unfortunate impression on her."

Lord Loring laughed.

"In any man but you, Romayne, I should call that affectation."

"Why?" Romayne asked, sharply.

Lord Loring looked unfeignedly surprised.

"My dear fellow, do you really think you are the sort of a man who impresses a woman unfavorably at first sight? For once in your life, indulge in the amiable weakness of doing yourself justice, and find a better reason for Miss Eyrecourt's embarrassment."

For the first time since he and his friend had been talking together, Romayne turned towards Stella. He innocently caught her in the act of looking at him. A younger woman, or a woman of weaker character, would have looked away again. Stella's noble head drooped; her eyes sank slowly until they rested on her long white hands crossed upon her lap. For a moment more Romayne looked at her with steady attention. He roused himself, and spoke to Lord Loring in lowered tones.

"Have you known Miss Eyrecourt for a long time?"

"She is my wife's oldest and dearest friend. I think, Romayne, you would feel interested in Stella, if you saw more of her."

Romayne bowed in silent submission to Lord Loring's prophetic remark.

"Let us look at the pictures," he said, quietly.

As he moved down the gallery the two priests met him. Father Benwell saw his opportunity of helping Penrose to produce a favorable impression.

"Forgive the curiosity of an old student, Mr. Romayne," he said, in his pleasant, cheerful way. "Lord Loring tells me you have sent to the country for your books. Do you find a London hotel favorable to study?"

"It is a very quiet hotel," Romayne answered; "and the people know my ways." He turned to Arthur. "I have my own set of rooms, Mr. Penrose," he continued, "with a room at your disposal. The solitude of my house in the country is distasteful to me. There are times when I want to see the life in the streets as a relief. Though we are in a hotel, I can promise that you will not be troubled by interruptions, when you kindly lend me the use of your pen."

Father Benwell answered before Penrose could speak.

"You may perhaps find my young friend's memory of some use to you, Mr. Romayne, as well as his pen. Penrose has studied in the Vatican Library. If your reading leads you that way, he knows more than most men of the rare old manuscripts which treat of the early history of Christianity."

This delicately-managed reference to Romayne's projected work on "The Origin of Religions" produced its effect. He became instantly interested in Penrose and his studies.

"I should like very much to speak to you about those manuscripts," he said. "Copies of some of them may, perhaps, be in the British Museum. Is it asking too much to inquire if you are disengaged this morning?"

"I am entirely at your service, Mr. Romayne."

"If you will kindly call at my hotel in an hour's time, I shall have looked over my notes, and shall be ready for you with a list of titles and dates. There is the address."

With those words, he advanced to take his leave of Lady Loring and Stella.

Father Benwell was a man possessed of extraordinary power of foresight—but he was not infallible. Seeing that Romayne was on the point of leaving the house, and feeling that he had paved the way successfully for Romayne's amanuensis, he too readily assumed that there was nothing further to be gained by remaining in the gallery. In arriving at this conclusion, he was additionally influenced by private and personal considerations. The interval before Penrose called at the hotel might be usefully filled up by some wise words of advice, relating to the religious uses to which he might turn his intercourse with Romayne, when he had sufficiently established himself in the confidence of his employer. There might, no doubt, be future opportunities for accomplishing this object, but Father Benwell was not a man to trust too implicitly in the future. The present occasion was, in respect of its certainty, the occasion that he preferred. Making one of his ready and plausible excuses, he returned with Penrose to the library, and so committed (as he himself discovered at a later time) one of the few mistakes in the long record of his life.

In the meanwhile, Romayne was not permitted to bring his visit to a conclusion without hospitable remonstrance on the part of Lady Loring. She felt for Stella with a woman's enthusiastic devotion to the interests of true love: and she had firmly resolved that a matter so trifling as the cultivation of Romayne's mind should not be allowed to stand in the way of the far more important enterprise of opening his heart to the influence of the sex.

"Stay and lunch with us," she said, when he held out his hand to bid her good-by.

"Thank you, Lady Loring, I never take lunch."

"Well, then, come and dine with us—no party; only ourselves. To-morrow and next day, we are disengaged. Which day shall it be?"

Romayne still resisted. "You are very kind. In my state of health I am unwilling to make engagements which I may not be able to keep."

Lady Loring was just as resolute on her side. She appealed to Stella. "Mr. Romayne persists, my dear, in putting me off with excuses. Try if you can persuade him."

"I am not likely to have any influence, Adelaide."

The tone in which she replied struck Romayne. He looked at her. Her eyes, gravely meeting his, held him with a strange fascination. She was not herself conscious how openly all that was noble and true in her nature, all that was most deeply and sensitively felt in her aspirations, spoke at that moment in her look. Romayne's face changed; he turned pale under the new emotion that she had roused in him. Lady Loring observed him attentively.

"Perhaps you underrate your influence, Stella?" she suggested.

Stella remained impenetrable to persuasion. "I have only been introduced to Mr. Romayne half an hour since," she said. "I am not vain enough to suppose that I can produce a favorable impression on any one in so short a time."

She had expressed, in other words, Romayne's own idea of himself, in speaking of her to Lord Loring. He was struck by the coincidence.

"Perhaps we have begun, Miss Eyrecourt, by misinterpreting one another," he said. "We may arrive at a better understanding when I have the honor of meeting you again."

He hesitated, and looked at Lady Loring. She was not the woman to let a fair opportunity escape her. "We will say to-morrow evening," she resumed, "at seven o'clock."

"To-morrow," said Romayne. He shook hands with Stella and left the picture gallery.

Thus far the conspiracy to marry him promised even more hopefully than the conspiracy to convert him. And Father Benwell, carefully instructing Penrose in the next room, was not aware of it!

* * * * * *

But the hours, in their progress, mark the march of events as surely as they mark the march of time. The day passed, the evening came—and with its coming, the prospects of the conversion brightened in their turn.

Let Father Benwell himself relate how it happened, in an extract from his report to Rome, written the same evening:

"I had arranged with Penrose that he should call at my lodgings, and tell me how he had prospered at the first performance of his duties as secretary to Romayne.

"The moment he entered the room, the signs of disturbance in his face told me that something serious had happened. I asked directly if there had been any disagreement between Romayne and himself.

"He repeated the word with every appearance of surprise. 'Disagreement?' he said. 'No words can tell how sincerely I feel for Mr. Romayne, and how eager I am to be of service to him.'

"Relieved so far, I naturally asked what had happened. Penrose betrayed a marked embarrassment in answering my question.

"'I have innocently surprised a secret,' he said, 'on which I had no right to intrude. All that I can honorably tell you shall be told. Add to your many kindnesses, Father, and don't command me to speak when it is my duty towards a sorely-tried man to be silent, even to you.'

"It is needless to say that I abstained from directly answering this strange appeal. If I found it necessary to our interests to assert my spiritual authority, I was of course resolved to do it. 'Let me hear what you can tell,' I replied, 'and then we shall see.'

"Upon this, he spoke. I need scarcely recall to your memory how careful we were, in first planning the attempt to recover the Vange property, to assure ourselves of the promise of success, which the peculiar character of the present owner held out to us. In reporting what Penrose said, I communicate a discovery which I venture to think will be as welcome to you as it was to me.

"He began by reminding me of what I had myself told him in speaking of Romayne. 'You mentioned having heard from Lord Loring of a great sorrow or remorse from which he was suffering.' Penrose said; 'and you added that your informant abstained from mentioning what the nature of that remorse, or of the nervous malady connected with it, might be. I know what he suffers, and why he suffers, and with what noble resignation he submits to his affliction.'

"There Penrose stopped. You know the emotional nature of the man. It was only by a hard struggle with himself that he abstained from bursting into tears. I gave him time, and then I asked how he made the discovery.

"He hesitated, but he answered plainly, so far. 'We were sitting together at the table, looking over his notes and memoranda,' Penrose said, 'when he suddenly dropped the manuscript from which he was reading to me. A ghastly paleness overspread his face. He started up, and put both his hands to his ears as if he heard something dreadful, and was trying to deafen himself to it. I ran to the door to call for help. He stopped me; he spoke in faint, gasping tones, forbidding me to call any one in to witness what he suffered. It was not the first time, he said; it would soon be over. If I had not courage to remain with him I could go, and return when he was himself again. I so pitied him that I found the courage to remain. When it was over, he took me by the hand and thanked me. I had staid by him like a friend, he said, and like a friend he would treat me. Sooner or later (those were his exact words) I must be taken into his confidence, and it should be now. He told me his melancholy story. I implore you, Father, don't ask me to repeat it! Be content if I tell you the effect of it on myself. The one hope, the one consolation for him, is in our holy religion. With all my heart I devote myself to his conversion, and, in my inmost soul, I feel the conviction that I shall succeed!'

"To this effect, and in this tone, Penrose spoke. I abstained from pressing him to reveal Romayne's confession. The confession is of no consequence to us. You know how the moral force of Arthur's earnestness and enthusiasm fortifies his otherwise weak character. I, too, believe he will succeed.

"But, before I close these lines, there is a question which I must submit to your consideration.

"You are already informed that there is a woman in our way. She shall not succeed in her designs on Romayne if I can prevent it. But other women may try their temptations on him. Even the conversion, from which we hope and expect so much, cannot be relied on to secure the restitution of the Vange property. It is not enough for us that the property is not entailed, and that there is no near relation with any pretensions to inherit it. While Romayne remains a marriageable man, there is always the danger of an heir to the estate being born. In my humble opinion, the one safe course is so to impress his mind, by means of Penrose, as to cultivate in him a vocation for the priesthood. As a priest, we are sure of him. Be so good as to present this idea at headquarters and let me know the result at the earliest possible opportunity."

Having completed his report, Father Benwell reverted to the consideration of his proposed inquiries into the past history of Stella's life.

Reflection convinced him that it would be unwise to attempt, no matter how guardedly, to obtain the necessary information from Lord Loring or his wife. If he assumed, at his age, to take a strong interest in a Protestant young lady who had notoriously avoided him, they would certainly feel surprise, and surprise might, in due course of development, turn to suspicion.

There was but one other person under Lord Loring's roof to whom he could address himself, and that person was the housekeeper. As an old servant, possessing Lady Loring's confidence, she might prove a source of information; and, as a good Catholic, she would feel flattered by the notice of the spiritual director of the household.

"It may not be amiss," thought Father Benwell, "if I try the housekeeper.

he Lincoln Monument.

THE first statue of the proposed national Lincoln Monument was cast October 27th at the bronze foundry of Clark Mills, the sculptor, near Washington, D. C. This monument is to be erected under the direction of a society known as the National Lincoln Monument Association, and the expense will be mainly covered by private subscription, though Congress supplies the necessary bronze in the shape of condemned cannon and will also be asked to contribute the pedestal. It will be a very elaborate structure, seventy feet high, consisting of three stories, with no less than thirty-six colossal bronze figures in different parts of it, six of which, at the base, will be equestrian statues, sixteen or eighteen feet high, representing Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Howard, Thomas and Wadsworth, the last named to represent the volunteer element in the army. Then there will be statues of those who were most prominent in civil positions during the war, including Lincoln's Cabinet, Thaddeus Stevens, Dr. Bellows, founder of the Sanitary Commission; Bishop Simpson, Henry Ward Beecher and George H. Stuart as a representative of the Christian Commission. Fred Douglass will appear as the type of what emancipation has done for the slave, and there will be other statues which are not yet fully decided upon. A notable feature of the monument will be three bas-reliefs, one representing the firing on Fort Sumter, which began the war, and the others representing the Senate and House adopting the amendments to the Constitution which abolished its results. The work has so far progressed that the model of Secretary Chase has been cast, and five others are ready for the process. The site of the monument has not yet been decided upon, but it will probably be located in Judiciary Park, near the centre of Washington.

How Celluloid is Made.

MR. PATTISON MUIR gives in Nature a description of the process of manufacture of celluloid, which is now so extensively used. When cotton, wool, linen, paper, or other substance largely consisting of cellulose is immersed in strong nitric acid, a mixture of two or more nitro-cellulloses is produced; a solution of this mixture in alcohol and ether has been long known as collodion. The starting point for the manufacture of celluloid was the discovery that this product when dissolved under heat and pressure in camphor, became, when allowed to cool, a hard substance like ivory. In January, 1870, Tribouillet and Besancele patented a process according to which the paper, linen, cotton, wood, etc., is dried at 100° centigrade, and nitrated in glass or glazed vessels having double bottoms through which water is constantly flowing. The nitrating acid consists of a mixture of three parts concentrated sulphuric acid, and two parts concentrated nitric acid containing nitrous acid. The dry and finely-divided material is first treated with acid which has already been once used for nitrating; the materials are mixed for ten or fifteen minutes with a kind of trowel; and the mass is pressed in a glazed iron cylinder, having the bottom and sides perforated to permit the acid to escape. The material is again treated with a fresh mixture of acids in the proportions just mentioned, and it is then washed with water in a series of wooden vessels with perforated bottoms placed one beneath the other on an inclined plane. The last particles of acid are removed by washing with dilute soda or ammonia and again with water. The material is then dissolved in an appropriate solvent, from which it is recovered in a paste-like form by distilling off the solvents. Artificial ivory is made by mixing 100 parts of the prepared cellulose with forty-two to fifty parts of finely-divided camphor, and pressing the mixture in a warm press, into which steam is conducted and connected with a chamber, where the fumes are condensed; and after being for some time in a warmer press, the material is dried in a chamber containing calcium chloride or sulphuric acid and connected with an air-pump.

Plain Talk to the Sultan.

IN the course of a recent audience with the Sultan Mr. Goschen, the British Minister, "with genuine English straightforwardness," uttered the following words of warning: "The foundations of your empire are much shattered; the slightest push may bring down the whole building. Sire, I entreat you to reflect upon the truth." Shortly afterwards Mr. Goschen called upon M. Tissot, the French Minister, and entreated him at his next audience to back up his warning with similar faithfulness. Great, however, was his astonishment when the Sultan, excited and indignant, turned upon him and said: "Never before has the Ambassador of any power dared to address such language to me." M. Tissot hurried to Mr. Goschen and informed him what the Sultan had said, adding that he had literally repeated the very words which Mr. Goschen had used. Hereupon, after a short pause, Mr. Goschen sent for his dragoman and then said to the man: "Did you faithfully translate into the words which I used?" The dragoman began to stammer out an apology. He had not the courage, he said, to render the expressions exactly, "for no man could ever dare to say such words to the great lord's very self." Hence, by an accident, the praise belongs to a Frenchman of being the first man to use a plainer manner of speech to the Sultan than any ambassador of a foreign nation had ever before ventured upon.

American Beer Abroad.

THE export of American beer and ale in casks has remained nearly stationary for a number of years, and, in fact, the number of gallons exported last year was not as large as in 1878 or 1877, and the value of such exportations last year was nearly $5,000 less than of the exportation in 1878. On the contrary, the export of our ale and beer in bottles has doubled from year to year for several years past, and is likely to increase for years to come in as great proportions. In 1870 this now flourishing trade was almost unknown to us. In that year the total shipments consisted of 1,076 dozen bottles, valued at $2,250. In 1879 there were shipped 125,873 dozen bottles, valued at $306,284. This increase in ten years has been wonderful. During the year 1879 the principal consumers of our bottled liquors were the people of the Spanish-American countries. Mexico took 54,243 dozen bottles, Brazil 17,400 dozen bottles, and Cuba 6,295 dozen bottles. England bought of us only 1,014 dozen bottles, and France patronized us to the meagre extent of 372 dozen bottles. Germany took 350 dozen bottles, which were like carrying coals to Newcastle, but it is believed she will want double that quantity this year. There is scarcely a South American country but bought of our bottled beer or ale, and it was also sent to Japan, China, Russia, Dutch Guiana, Spain, and the British possessions in Africa. While this trade is being rapidly built up to our profit, the official figures show that our importation of foreign beer and ale is not increasing. In 1872 we imported 1,989,713 gallons, valued at $1,488,781. In 1875 we imported 2,167,28 gallons, valued at $1,742,150. In 1877 the importations dropped to 914,277 gallons; in 878 to 767,709 gallons, and last year amounted to 897,687 gallons, valued at $686,806. As our malt liquors become more widely known the demand for them is sure to increase, until, if the present high standards are kept up, they will become the favorites in countries that now buy almost wholly of England and Germany.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Palaver of Chiefs at Old Calabar River.

THE palaver took place at Duke Town, Old Calabar River, on August 9th. Her Majesty's Consul, while on a round of visits to the different rivers in the Bight of Biafra, went to Duke Town, about five miles up the Old Calabar River, an important trading station, where palm oil is exchanged for Liverpool and Manchester goods. Some time back Prince Duke had been crowned King of Old Calabar by the acting Consul, Mr. Esson, by the title of "King Duke, Ephraim Eyamba IX." This nomination did not satisfy the neighboring chiefs, who wished to elect James Eyamba, the rightful heir, according to their ideas. A grand palaver of all the kings and chiefs of the district was held, by order of Her British Majesty's Consul Hewett, on board the ship Decoy, on August 9th. The chief personages sat on the seats provided for them on the quarter deck, near the Consul and the Commanding Officer, Lieutenant G. P. Henderson; the remainder found places on biscuit-boxes, etc., and formed a picturesque group in their many-colored garments. Prince Archibong, son of the late King, is leaning over the breech of the gun, denouncing the treading monster (King Duke Ephraim, etc.) as having violated all the former compacts made with the British Government. On his right is Prince James Eyamba, the "Claimant," on his left is Hickaw Adam, Esq., a staunch supporter of the "Claimant." At the table are Consul Hewett, Lieutenant Henderson (in the background), and a missionary from Creek Town, who acted as interpreter. Sitting at the table is Mr. Fanshaw (Chairman of the Court of Equity), and on his right sits King Duke Ephraim Eyamba IX. in a pink silk dressing-gown, with yellow quilted collar and sleeves. He has a white top hat, which he occasionally sets in a jaunty fashion on top of his head. King Eyo Honesty, of Creek Town, who sits just behind him, was the great success. His robe was of fine green silk, worked over in a flower pattern with colored threads, his crown beat anything out of a Drury Lane pantomime, being made up of crimson velveteen, gilt medal, mock ermine, etc., and most of his time was occupied in the endeavor to keep it safely balanced on his head.

The Milan Exposition of 1881.

The last city to engage in an exposition enterprise is Milan, Italy, where buildings are now being put up for the demonstration which will be inaugurated early in next year. We give an illustration of the façade of the structure in which the entrances will be located.

The Austrian Emperor in Poland.

The triumphal progress of the Emperor Francis Joseph through Galicia a few weeks back would have secured a share of public notice at any time, but taken in connection with many other indications of the policy of the Hapsburgs towards the Poles, it deserves to take rank as an event in the domestic, and perhaps also the foreign, relations of the Dual Monarchy. Since the accession of the Taaffe Ministry to office, the favor shown to the Polish nation has been all that could be expected from a Cabinet which had set its heart upon conciliating even the proverbial obstinacy of Czechs. No circumstance was, apparently, omitted which could enhance the importance and significance of the Imperial visit. Wherever an ovation was awaiting him, thither the Emperor directed his progress. And ovations awaited him on every side. The national traditions and associations of the Poles were marked out by him for every possible encouragement. On many occasions four hundred Galician nobles rode in his train. The addresses of the municipalities and orders of society were read, in the Polish tongue, to the monarch, and were graciously acknowledged in the same language. The President of the Diet also bade the Emperor welcome in Polish.

The Prince of Wales in Scotland.

On Monday afternoon, September 27th, their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold and Prince John of Glucksburg arrived at Mar Lodge in the Highlands on a visit to the Earl of Fife. In the evening Lord Fife gave a grand ball, at which his distinguished guests were present, and the entertainment included a torchlight procession and dance by the Duff Highlanders. Next day the Prince of Wales, Prince John of Glucksburg and Lord Fife went out in the North Deeside Forest to indulge in "a deer-drive."

Cliff Batteries in Albania.

Under date of October 27th, intelligence comes from Constantinople that Dervish Pasha has been appointed Governor of Albania, and charged with the arrangement of a mode for effecting the peaceful surrender of Dulcigno. But it remains to be seen whether the Albanians will consent to let this cession be carried peaceably into effect. Persons acquainted with the country and the people say that the Turkish Government has not such absolute control over them, and rather expect that there will be an obstinate resistance, not probably to the entrance of the Montenegrins into the seaport town, but to the settlement of the interval frontier in accordance with the resolutions of the Berlin Conference. It is therefore by no means quite certain, as yet, though for the sake of humanity one would fain wish it may be so, that the picturesque figures shown in our illustration, Mirdites, Clementi, and other warlike tribesmen of the North Albanian frontier, will not continue their work of building parapets on the edge of the cliff to shelter them while firing upon the enemy when he advances by the road below. These men have Martini-Henry rifles, and great abundance of cartridges, which they know how to use, in guerrilla warfare, at least as well as the Montenegrins; and it is to be apprehended that the conflict, once provoked, would rage for a long time, and would be carried on in a savage and ferocious spirit.

"Changing Guard" at the Horse Guards.

Here we have represented one of the prettiest and most popular of London sights. In fair weather there is a goodly crowd assembled to admire the bright uniforms, waving plumes, and flashing arms and accoutrements of the men, and the sleek, glossy coats of the horses; and even on the wettest of wet days many people are to be found watching the evolutions. The duty of mounting guard is shared by the different detachments of the Household Cavalry, who relieve each other every morning, on week days at eleven and on Sundays at ten o'clock. The "old guard," or that which has completed its twenty-four hours' duty, is drawn up on the left of the yard, as shown in our picture, in readiness to receive the new guard which enters through the Whitehall gates. There are two guards: a "full" guard, consisting of thirty-four troopers, four non-commissioned officers, and two officers (excepting when the Queen is in London, when there are three), and a "short" or non-commissioned officers' guard, consisting of thirteen men and two non-com's. In addition to these any cavalry regiment quartered at Hounslow furnishes four men and a corporal for dispatch duty. Generally speaking, there is always a full guard during a Parliamentary session.

OUR NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

THE shipments of bulk grain from St. Louis to foreign ports, by way of New Orleans, from January 1st to October 23d, were 13,314,000 bushels, against 9,164,838 bushels for the same time last year.

THERE is a great lack of transportation facilities at present in the West. Nearly all the railways in the West are at present suffering from a scarcity of cars. The demand is universal and unprecedentedly large.

RETURNS received from the four hundred official reporters authorized to be appointed by the Legislature, show that the value of the crops raised in Pennsylvania in 1880 is $111,250,000, and the value of live stock $85,570,913. The acreage of wheat was 1,450,000; hay 2,550,000; corn 1,261,000, and oats 1,186,000. The cost of fences in the State is $193,000,000.

THE people of Mobile are following the example set by Memphis, and have arranged a compromise with her creditors to cover all the outstanding indebtedness. Mobile, like Memphis, has secured a vastly better and more economical government by the repeal of her charter and the appointment of commissioners. The cost of local government, which ranged from $200,000 to $400,000 formerly, has been reduced to $100,000.

SEVERAL flouring mills at Sherman, Texas, are to be converted into woolen and cotton mills. The uncertainty of the wheat crop in that locality, and the better chances for cotton and wool, are the sufficient reasons for the change.

VERMONT takes the lead in the production of maple sugar, producing from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 pounds annually. New York comes next, producing one-third less. Ohio comes third, and produces about half as much as New York. The States of Illinois, Indiana, New Hampshire, Michigan and Wisconsin produce annually about 1,000,000 pounds each.

THE tobacco outlook has increased the value of timbered land in Buncombe County, N. C., at least fifty per cent. within the last three years.

OF the 14,600,000 quintals of grain imported into France during the first eight months of the present year, 9,000,000 came from America.

THE statement of the business of all the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company east of Pittsburg and Erie, for September, 1880, as compared with the same month in 1879, shows an increase in gross earnings of $311,615; an increase in expenses of $426,746. The nine months of 1880, as compared with the same period in 1879, show an increase in gross earnings of $5,728,404, an increase in expenses of $3,605,207. All lines west of Pittsburg and Erie for the nine months of 1880 show a surplus over liabilities of $2,046,293, being a gain over the same period in 1879 of $1,977,397.

THE demand for laborers on the plantations in Louisiana is so excessive that they cannot be had at one dollar per day, with lodging and food.

THE tide of immigration to this country is flowing with unabated activity, the total number of arrivals for the year ending June 30th, 1880, being 457,343, an increase of 279,417 over the corresponding period of last year, and within 2,560 of the largest ever known. The value of these immigrants to the country of their adoption is enormous, and much greater proportionately than their value to the old country which they have left, because the majority of them do not come to occupy old houses or old lands, but seek their fortunes in new and untried territories.

STATISTICIANS say that $18,000,000 are now invested in silk manufactures in this country.

THE Wilmington (N. C.) Star of the 23d ult. states that "it has been only a year or two since pine straw first became an article of export in this market, and now we learn it is almost impossible to supply the demand for it. It is shipped North, where it undergoes certain preparations, and is then used for stuffing mattresses, in the place of oakum, and for other purposes, besides yielding a kind of oil in the first process to which it is subjected."

THE new blast-furnace of Glendon, Pa., is about complete. Its capacity is about 60 tons per week. The furnace is 80 feet high, with 18 feet bosh. The four other furnaces of this place and South Easton are running full time.

AT Pueblo, Colorado, the new steel rail mill is rapidly approaching completion. The stacks are now being put into position. Iron ore is found in great abundance in the vicinity of Leadville, and it is proposed to utilize it.

THE annual report of the appointment division of the Post Office Department for the last fiscal year was completed on October 25th. It shows that the number of post-offices in operation in the United States on the 30th of June last was 42,999, an increase of 2,134 during the year. One thousand seven hundred and sixty-one postmasters are appointees of the President. The remaining 41,238 offices are filled by appointments of the Postmaster-General. Besides the nearly 43,000 postmasters, there are 17,400 persons throughout the country who perform service and receive compensation upon the written authorization of the Postmaster-General or his chief assistants. In addition to the post-office clerks above reckoned, for whose employment allowances are made to Presidential postmasters of the first and second grades, it is estimated at the department that there are at least 50,000 persons acting as clerks in the third and fourth class post-offices who look for their employment and compensation directly to the local authority; and it is believed, therefore, that there are now not less than 132,000 persons directly connected with our postal service.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A COMMERCIAL treaty between Brazil and Chile was signed on September 1st.

—THERE is a ministerial crisis at Belgrade, caused by Austria threatening to close her frontier against Servia.

—GENERAL GARIBALDI and his son have withdrawn their resignations as members of the Italian Chamber of Deputies.

—THE tenants of several landlords in the County Sligo, Ireland, have been notified that if they pay full rents they will be shot.

—ALL the children of the Batoum refugees at Ismid, Turkey, are dead, the women are dying and the men must soon succumb.

—ALL the officials of Oxford University who took part in the recent corrupt elections there are to be dismissed from their posts.

—THE new Greek Cabinet has been formed with Mr. Coumoundouros as President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs.

—THE German Federal Council has interdicted the residence of Socialists in Hamburg, Altona, Wandsbek, Pinneberg and Lauenburg.

—THE Pope has reaffirmed his right to temporal power, and described the fete celebrating the entry of Italian troops into Rome as "accursed."

—THE Massachusetts Railroad Commissioners have decided against the establishment of elevated railroads in Boston and other cities of the State.

—LARGE bodies of British troops have been ordered home from India. This is considered indicative that the Government apprehends no further serious disturbance in that quarter.

—IT is expected that the French Tribunal of Conflicts will decide the Jesuit question November 6th, and a decision in one case which will govern all the others will probably be given on the same day.

—THE last quarterly report of the Bureau of Statistics shows that the total imports and exports of the country carried in American bottoms has fallen from over 90 per cent. in 1827 to 17 per cent. in 1880.

—REPORTS from Tientsin, China, announce that active preparations for war with Russia are being carried on at the arsenal. The Russian Admiral, Lessofsky, is making preparations to support the demands he is instructed to make.

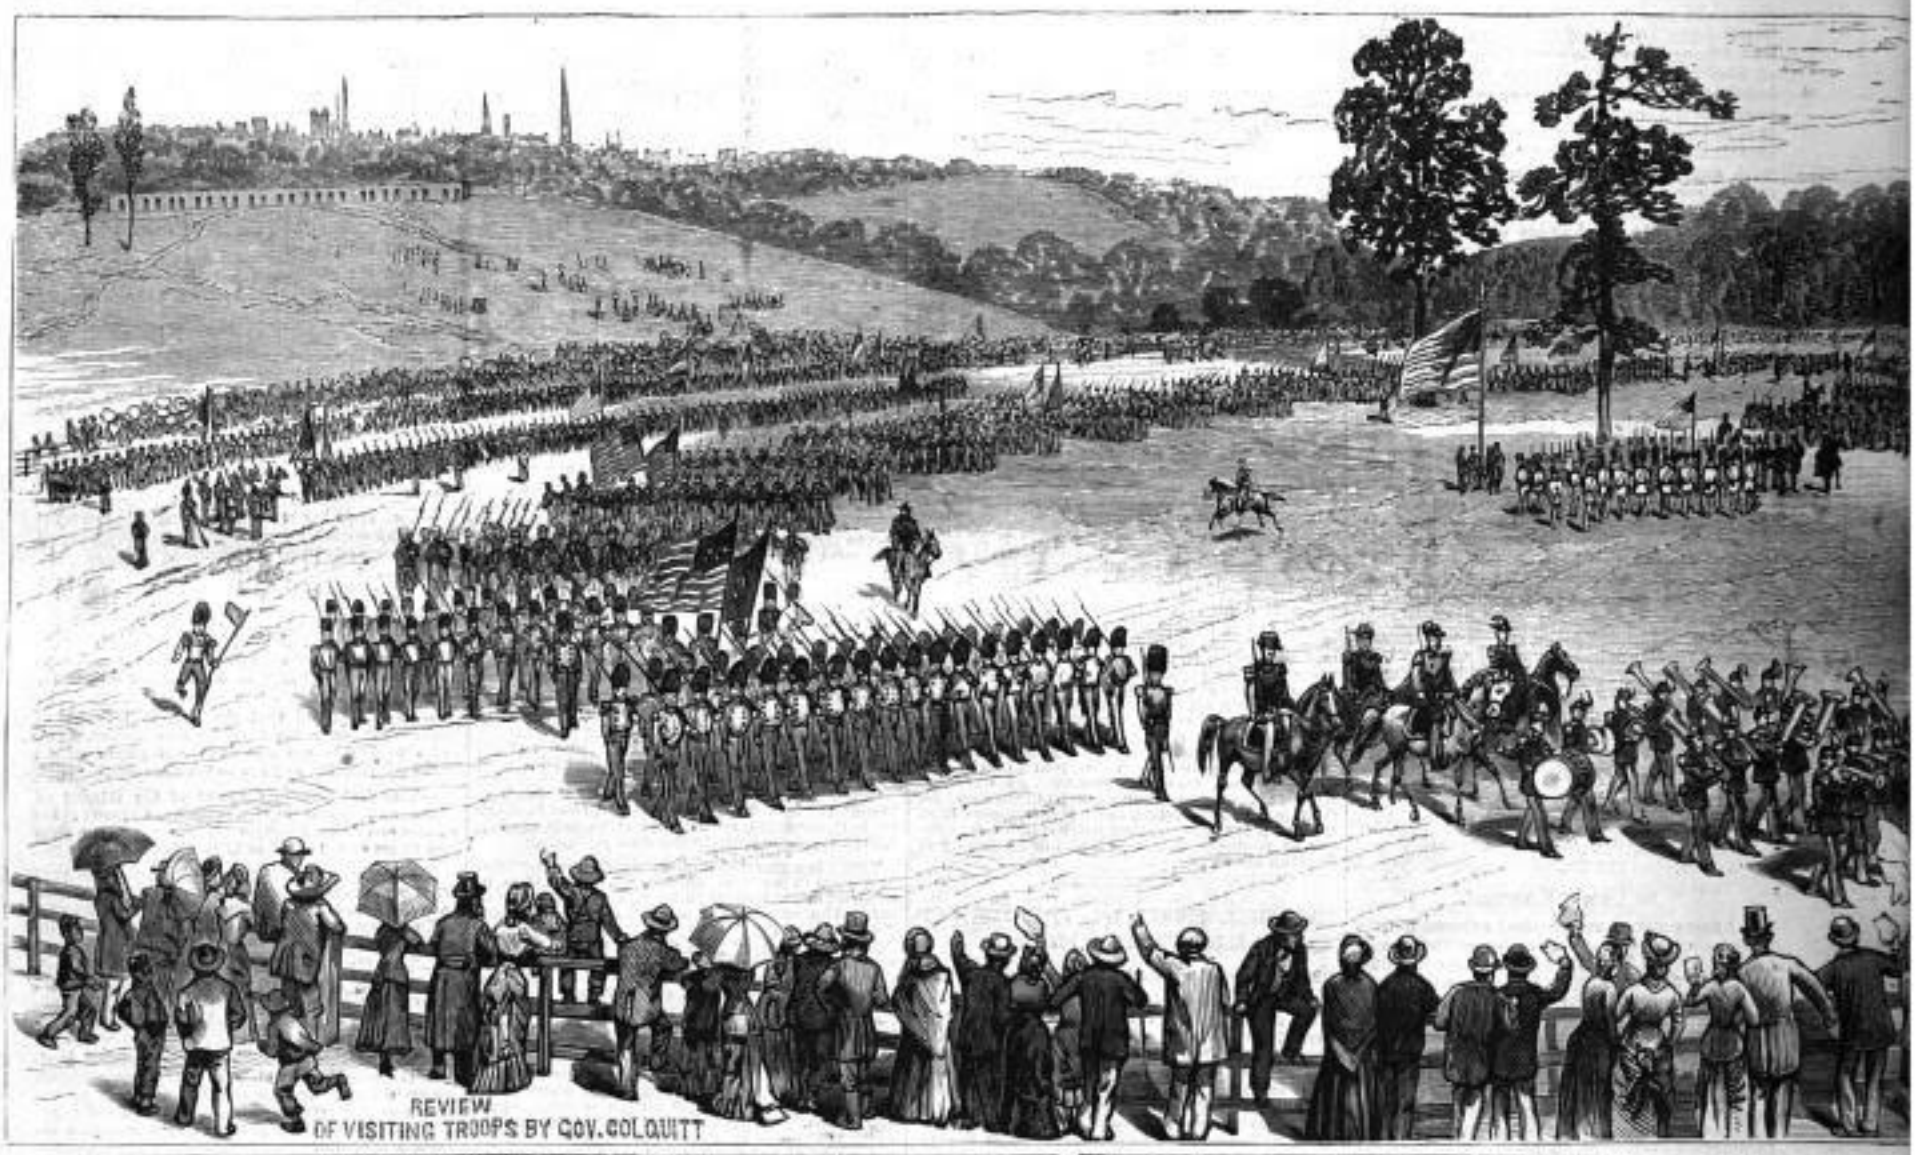
—THE State Department has received a dispatch from Minister Lowell, in London, stating that answers received to his circular letter sent among British publishers show a decided sentiment in favor of an international copyright treaty.

—THE number of Americans established in business in London is greater than that of the American colony in Paris. The Parisian Americans are, for the most part, free from business cares, only a few artists and literary men being professionally occupied on the banks of the Seine.

—LATE dispatches state that 20,000 Kurds are advancing on Tabriz. They have massacred the entire population of Se-Uj-Bolak. The garrison of Tabriz is only 2,000 strong. Reinforcements of 7,000 men, twenty guns, with five Austrian officers under command of an uncle of the Shah, have been hurriedly sent from Teheran. The Kurds occupy 3,000 square miles of Persian territory.

—THE Jesuits are swarming to Venice and the Venetian provinces like bees to a hive, to the indignation of the Liberals, but to the delight of the Moderates and Clericals. The why and wherefore is not difficult to discover. No Ministry, whether Conservative or Liberal, since 1866 has thought of applying to Venetia the decree for the expulsion of the Jesuits; and this abstinence explains the flocking thither of all, or nearly all, the members expelled from France.

—THE southern and eastern coast of England was last week swept by a hurricane that is unprecedented in the annals of that country for severity and duration. Bridges were destroyed, trees uprooted, towns flooded and business on railway and telegraph lines suspended. Twenty-four vessels were wrecked and over thirty lives lost. At Leeds several mills have been stopped and hundreds of persons temporarily thrown out of employment. At Dublin much property was destroyed and over fifty families were left homeless.



—CHINESE advices state that a serious riot took place in Canton on September 15th, between two rival factions of the lower order of natives. The immediate cause of the outbreak was a fire in a shed near the Roman Catholic cathedral. The French priests endeavored to quell the disturbance, and were assaulted with stones and other missiles by the rioters, and the mission house was attacked. The military were called out, and, after firing a volley or two, the mob was dispersed. Some lives were lost among the natives, and one of the priests was wounded. The Governor of Macao sent a gunboat to the scene, but before its arrival order had been restored by the prompt action of the Chinese officers.

—THE St. Petersburg Golos devotes a long article to the subject of the failure of the crops. It says: "The outlook for Russia is very gloomy, as the country, whose ordinary export is 40,000,000 quarters, will have to buy grain from abroad. How to feed the peasantry during the coming Winter is a problem occupying the serious attention of the Government, and there is no ground for expecting a good harvest in the future. Thousands of insects defied the efforts to exterminate them and lie hidden under deep snow, until Spring enables them to renew their work of destruction. The Golos gives the result of the past financial year, showing that the expenditure exceeds the estimates by 26,000,000 rubles ($20,800,000).

—IT is reasonable to predict that there will soon occur an overwhelming rush of the softer sex to Mississippi, in consequence of the peculiar rights and privileges secured to married women by a law contained in that State's recently revised code. Briefly, this law is thus described: "Marriage shall impose no disability or incapacity on the wife in the ownership, acquisition or disposal of property of any sort. Husbands and wives may sue each other, and the wife can will her property, real and personal, as if she were not married. Each inherits the property of the other, if there be no children, and each a child's part if there are children of their descendants." No other State grants these rights, and the future operations of Mississippi laws in this respect will not fail to attract a general interest.

—AT a meeting of the Book-Trade Association, held at Philadelphia, on October 23th, for the purpose of considering the proposed international copyright treaty, a committee was appointed to bring a proposed Bill before the publishers and present it to Congress. This Bill provides that it shall be lawful for any citizen of the United States to hold the copyright of any book, map, chart, etc., whether written or produced by a citizen of any other country or not, provided it is published and exposed for sale within two months from the date of publication in the country of its origin, except in the case of translations from foreign languages in which case an interval of four months shall be permitted, and of dramatic compositions, in which case an interval of six months between the first representation in the United States shall be allowed.

SOUVENIR.

LIKE a Sultana clad in raiment bright,
Voluptuous Provence, draped in olive trees,
Balmy with grain and the soft southern breeze,
Dreamed to the star-thronged heaven one perfect night.
It seemed as if our God had made the site
His rare and unique fantasy to please,
And for his wonders and his mysteries
Created it from roses, calm and light!
'Twas there—sweet spot!—where thy ripe lips divine,
In passionate embrace—oh, long-craved boon!—
Placed their soft, troubled warmth unto my own;
'Twas there that thou wert mine, that I was thine;
While over us the Autumn-mellow moon
Silvered the languorous ripples of the Rhine!

F. S. SALTUS.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

"HER weak and frivolous nature," continued Valentine Gabaudie, "was entirely incapable of any deep emotion. She even faced me after her bitter injury—she had heard from the servants of my infatuation for my guest—she came to me without one word of apology, without one thought of concern for the past. She spoke of her shame without a blush, as if her trip had been a common occurrence, and even when she told of her motherhood not the slightest tinge of consciousness or embarrassment was apparent. God knows from whom she inherited her shameless, animal nature! Her mother was proud in her purity, her father a true-born gentleman; even I, in my weakness and infatuation, committed no act for which I need have blushed. I was stricken with horror at the unnatural desertion of her child, and, upon inquiry, found that his lordship had been quite as loath to be incumbered with his offspring, and had therefore placed it in an asylum. Then they returned to Cuba, and he compelled her to get ashore at our coast.

"I saw at once that he had made toys of us both, that he had abused my faith and betrayed my child for his amusement. And now that he was ready to return to his native country, we were tossed aside as worthless baubles that had served to while away a tedious hour. A woman's faith, a child's honor!—what were they? Though of little value to him, I swore they should be avenged. Deeper and deeper grew my hatred. From that hour a smile has never crossed my lips. He had been gone one year when, through our lawyer, I received a deed for some valuable property in Russia, called the Schaffuskie Lands. It was in this way that I became aware of our betrayer's true identity. I suppose a half-remorse had settled upon him for his deed, and he tried to buy off us and his conscience. The letter stated that Count Lagors was dead, and, owing to my kindness to him, had bequeathed to us a valuable property known as the Schaffuskie Lands. For some reason the deed was drawn up under the name of Maize Dresden, which we took as an intimation that the child should be called Maize if ever we came across her. I also believed that in this act I saw an unwritten request to search for the poor, deserted baby and take it under our protection. Again I was deluded. I mourned that my vengeance had thus escaped me. Never for a moment did I doubt the reality of the statement until years afterwards, when you stood in Lord Ashhurst's apartment, and in your account of the misfortune of your exiled friend, let fall the name of Lagors. I pieced the torn letter together, recognized the writing, and saw the signature. Again he had lied to me—for some reason he desired us to suppose him dead. From that moment my old hatred awoke.

"In the meantime Lord Ashhurst, who was also traveling on our island, met and loved Gypsy. I don't think she ever really loved him, though as years went on she grew to respect him, and if there was any affection in her for him, it was such a love as a child bears for a noble parent. But she knew that by marrying him she could enter that gay world for which she so hungered. So they were married in the old mansion, where we all remained for a year. Lord Ashhurst having procured the best masters for his wife. Before the expiration of the year Lady Ashhurst gave birth to another child—no offspring of shame, no illegitimate, forsaken babe this time, but a son born to the haughty order of the powerful Ashhursts, and upon whom was showered every luxury and attention. Strange to say, for this favored infant Gypsy experienced a wild, childish love that was wonderful in her nature. And I was thankful to see it; it showed me that, after all, she was not lower than the brutes. When I saw her and Lord Ashhurst fondling the child, I often used to wonder if no memory ever came to her of that dark page in her life—of that forsaken one left to the care and charity of strangers. When the child was three months old he sickened and died. It was a fearful blow to Lord Ashhurst, as also to Gypsy. It hastened their departure for England, as the place where his son died grew revolting to Jack. Then in Gypsy's heart, naturalized by the affection for her infant born under happier circumstances, arose the long slumbering love for her first-born. At her request, Lord Jack, who granted her every caprice, consented to take a trip to Greece. There she secretly instituted a search for the child which she discovered; and we contrived for Jack to see her one day as she lay in the sun among some Athenian ruins, her small, curled, bare limbs gleaming like marble in the sun rays. 'She was a beautiful child,' Lord Toboskie is white to the lips and strongly agitated. 'From the moment Jack first saw her his great heart, lonely and embittered by the death of his own child, centred upon this one. Our plan worked perfectly. It was he who first proposed to adopt her, which was what Gypsy had intended to do. Then, by giving a large sum of money to the woman who had taken charge of her, she consented to tell the story we related to her, which was simply that the child was the descendant of a Russian, and that this deed was pinned to it when found. Gypsy, with her natural greed and self-interest, desiring to retain the title for the valuable Russian lands. Lord Ashhurst soon grew to adore the child. I think he knew no difference between it and his own. It was a species of worship. Soon we all returned to England, where Lady Ashhurst's beauty won for her a royal welcome, and, owing to this and also to the ancient title of her husband, she soon became the rage. Here the wisdom of the world soon showed her the necessity if not the intrinsic value of honor, and, growing worldly-wise, she conducted herself like a model of propriety. The nearest that she has ever approached to again falling has been with you. But I watched and saved her."

Toboskie's hands clinch, yet he knows that the mad weakness of that brief moment has given this woman the right to insinuate that he would not have held as sacred the wife of his friend, even if she had not interposed her presence.

"Then," continues this remarkable woman, "when I discovered that my enemy was alive, as I have said, all my old hatred awoke. I determined to wreak my revenge. In my spleen every other emotion was swallowed up, and I determined to make Jack—the truest, ay, only friend I ever found—the road to my desire. To do this I resolved to impoverish him. There is no necessity to enter into particulars; suffice to say, I accomplished my aim. The commencement of this was the loss of that memorable race, to do which I bribed the trainer. Then we came to Russia. Lady Ashhurst did not recognize her old lover in Count Lagors, she never having heard his proper name, and he again fell madly in love with her. This time sincerely, for she was no longer the ignorant untamed child, but the beautiful and accomplished peeress. What followed you know. Count Toboskie, it is now that I will show you the very great error you have been in and how very mortal you are. Can you not divine the revelation I have to make?" The gleaming, sunken eyes that look up to him have gathered an expression of inestimable malevolence, of malicious triumph. Still no shadow of the truth dawns upon him. The stupendous injury that has been done the woman of his love never enters his brain.

"No," he says, "I have no idea of what you wish to say. Nor can I see how I should be affected by any revelation you have to make."

"You think so?" Suffering the throes of a hundred deaths, this woman has yet power to enjoy her vengeance. "I think you will change your mind. Count Toboskie, Maize Ashhurst never committed that murder. Even while you condemned her to exile she was innocent. I killed Count Lagors! It was my vengeance!"

CHAPTER XLVIII.—HIS IDOL IS PURIFIED.

AS those words, with their terrible import, sunder the stillness of the death chamber, Toboskie sits for a moment as if turned to stone; he staggers to his feet and on the hush breaks a long, hoarse, shuddering cry, as he realizes the foul and bitter wrong that has been done. He bends above the woman as she lies there, a self-confessed murderess, and, like a blood-hound seizing his prey, his grip falls upon her where she lies, and in his eyes is the lurid light of murder—that fierce, brutal thirst of the tiger for blood is heavy upon him. In the horror and agony of this revelation he is literally mad. Of only one thing is he conscious; he will have her blood—this woman who all through her life has slain without mercy, in whose breast is the cruelty of the beasts of the jungle. He thinks of the lives wrecked and slaughtered by her hatred, of the woman of his worship who has been dragged through a persecution more bitter than any martyr that ever perished in the flames. He lives again the horror, the shame, the agony of that wretched past, when the public clamored for her blood and feasted upon her loveliness as she stood branded before them a murderess. He thinks of those long, weary months of exile, of the man who died in the prison cell, of his own stricken manhood, made accursed by the misery of his love, and heavier and heavier grows his grip, while his eyes hot, lurid like a tiger's, look down in hers.

"I will have your life for it!" he mutters—"it is the law of your own traitorous, accursed race. Blood for blood, and you have slain so many—so many!"

But the woman stricken with one death has nothing to fear from another, and her eyes look at him in their savage triumph.

"Ah, my Count Toboskie," she whispers. "I have humbled you at last. I have driven you so mad with pain that you strike a dying woman! You begin to see that you are no more than human."

Where he stands in his agony and speechless remorse his grip falls from her and he shrinks back as though she were a viper. The icy composure, the haughty dominance, that proud superiority, that grand indomitable will that has caused him to look upon other men as mere tools for his service and has given him the ruling power of Russia—in this moment he stands stripped of them all and in his glorious manhood is smitten to the dust. It is retribution, it is punishment for his haughty arrogance, his blood-proud, honor exalted self-sufficiency, and, sinking into the chair, again that long, hoarse, shuddering groan breaks from him as he covers his eyes with his hands, his brain still giddy with the horrible riot of contending and delirious emotions. Only now runs straight and sure that deathless remorse that has fastened upon his vitals like the poisonous fangs of a serpent.

"You refused once to come under my power; you acknowledge it now?" The jeering, triumphant voice rouses his old wrath.

"Woman, devil, sorceress! whatever you are, how did it happen—how was it accomplished?" His voice is hoarse and that desperate madness of his rage has fastened upon him.

"It was simple enough, yet under my management you are aware that no shadow of suspicion was ever attached to us. That night Lady Ashhurst received a note from the count, commanding her to visit him in private at his castle, and telling her that if she refused it would be at her peril, as he was aware of her secret. It was the first intimation that she had ever had of her past being known. In the triumphs of her present life she had almost forgotten it herself. Still she refused to go, and locked herself away in my chamber. Then Maize, finding the note and supposing that she had gone to keep the engagement, went immediately to Count Lagors's castle. You remember what a stormy night that was, my lord? Well, all through the rain and the sleet and the bitter cold, Maize walked to Castle Lagors—walked in her ball robes, in her thin slippers, with the ice and water above her ankles. And once in her haste she fell, which re-broke her arm. She told me this herself, and, little cause as I have to love her, I would sooner believe her word than another person's oath. I had missed her, and, unseen by her, was watching for her return. I saw her when she entered the hall. Her clothes were saturated with rain, and over her bare shoulders and her face and arms was a thick armor of ice. She had gone to save Gypsy's honor; yet you pronounced her a murderess. Do you remember that strife that has always been between you two, my lord—that bitter struggle for ascendency? Well, Count Toboskie, who is the victor now?"

The lurid, cruel eyes fasten upon him as he sits in his terrible punishment. He is no longer the haughty minister, with whose fame Russia is teeming, flushed and crowned with his triumphs. Though those for which he has toiled crowd his path, in the year that has passed they have grown as worthless baubles. The iron of his indomitable nature is bent like a reed. And now, in this moment, has come the final blow. Suffer more than he has in the past he believed he could not. Yet in this moment a greater agony than he has ever yet known has tightened around him. He is weary and worn and sick unto death with his great travail. He sits there in the falling dusk, his hands clinched, his teeth sunk deep in his lip, a band as of red-hot iron girding his temples—sits there smitten with the horror, the agony, the remorse of his deed, when he refused to save that woman from her living death—his face dark and worn with the memories that throng about him in this hour of retribution.

"In the meantime," continues the merciless voice of his enemy, "Count Lagors had sent a second message by his valet, and that this was not brought forward at the trial has always surprised me, but I suppose the man kept silent for fear of involving himself in trouble. This second message was more imperative than the first, and with it was a private key by which we could admit ourselves. I, having visited the count before in his castle, knowing the way to his apartment. Terrified by his threats, Lady Ashhurst dared not refuse, and we went to his castle and returned without a living soul being aware of it. It was not until that hour that Gypsy recognized in him her old lover. Then in my presence he told her of his love, and begged her to fly with him. She was terrified at his threats of vengeance if she refused, for he had been drinking heavily and was almost delirious. I will not enter into the particulars as to how, under my influence, Gypsy sprang at the count with an open dagger and inflicted a wound; then in her excitement she fainted. Lagors was in no condition to defend himself, and I dealt him that final blow that pierced his traitorous, faithless heart. I had my vengeance; though until a few weeks ago Gypsy always believed that she killed him!"

"Great God! and she let her own child go out to martyrdom without raising her hand to save!" The hoarse exclamation breaks from Toboskie, were he sits shivering under his mortal agony, the dews as of death standing upon his broad brow. Then he remembers his eternal shrinking from this woman, of his vague horror of her hidden nature, of his presentiment of that fatal weakness blended with a certain selfishness that was the latent trait of her character. He read it then, he divined its existence—that weakness that could send her child out to die upon the scaffold—that consigned her to a worse fate, a living, endless torture, while she wrapped herself in her purple and fine linen, and led the free, gay, dauntless life of her order, while her soul was stained with human blood. He looks down at the raw, ghastly face upon the pillows, and still again fastens upon him that savage rage, as he sees how all through her life this woman has slain without mercy.

"I do pronounce this retribution," he says, that mad impulse to wrench out that cruel, merciless life rising warm in his breast, as he stands there banned with his intolerable anguish, "and one well merited: On earth or in heaven, there has been no sanctity too great for your hatred and your vengeance. You have branded the innocent with your own guilt—no gratitude, no sentiment whatever, has interfered with your hate. You have pursued your own course at the wrecking of every life that stood in your way. And weak, erring as Lady Ashhurst is, I would rather run her chance of salvation than yours. She sinned first, but she was young then—nothing but a child. But since then she has been your tool, your victim. Over her you have wielded a tyrannical and relentless sway by means of your magnetism. You have made her your slave—have stained her soul with the crime of Cain—have converted her into an instrument of vengeance—have damned her for all eternity—she, whose responsibility you took into your keeping, who was given into your hands by her dying mother! You loved your sister? Yet you have wrecked her child—have stained her soul with crimes that the blood of Christ could scarcely wash clean. There is no atonement, no reparation you could make for the betrayal of your sacred trust; and I tell you that in the hereafter you will meet your sister face to face, and at your hands she will demand her child. What answer have you to give?"

The strength, the malice, the triumph of those sunken eyes vanish. In them comes a wild, terrified light, while at the same time he sees that her strength is exhausted—that the hour of death is drawing nigh. Her hands lie clinched tightly upon the bed, the dews of death stand in clammy moisture upon her brow.

"I had not thought of that," she mutters. "So much has come to me since that I have almost forgotten Lenore. Oh, my God! this anguish is unendurable. Ease, ease—give me ease!" She starts up in the couch—in the sudden, fierce throes of death—while her eyes, glazed and agonized, seem starting from their sockets. But the man, with his iron, relentless nature, looks down upon her unmoved. In his savage Pagan disposition, he could see this woman drawn and quartered at this moment without raising a hand to save her. Such mercy as she gave, he stands ready to give to her.

"Ease—ease—ease!" she moans, falling back upon the pillow. "Give me something to drive away this fiery pain. Oh! I am consumed with flame! I am burning up—burning up! God, this suffering!"

He sees that she is dying, and hastily summons the nurse, while her low moans for aid fill the apartment. In one moment her strength and vitality have succumbed to the torture, and not the frailest atom of endurance remains to aid her in the desperate conflict. And while death draws nearer and nearer the vail of delirium shrouds her brain, and in this final moment memory drifts back to the loved and lost.

"Will nobody help me?" she cries, wildly. "Oh, God, I am left, like a brute, to die alone! Oh, Gypsy, Gypsy! once we were so happy! Lenore, I forgot that she was yours; I forgot that you put her in my arms as you died! Oh, Lenore, what shall I say to you! I forgot—I forgot! If I could only see her once before I go—if I could only touch her hand—dear little Gypsy, with her angel face!" And thus she wanders on. Down the stolid face of the hired nurse roll some tears, but Toboskie stands untouched, unmoved. This woman has slain without mercy—has doomed the innocent to a living death, and his cold, relentless nature holds no pity for one who herself was untouched by pity or remorse.

"I am dying—dying!" murmurs the feeble voice. "I shall meet Lenore. Oh, somebody pray—pray for Lenore's sake." She turns her wild eyes upon her companions, and the nurse shrinks back, with no prayer ready at the request. But Toboskie stands mute, motionless as stone, his chill and lurid eyes fastened steadily upon her.

She raises herself in the bed and seizes his hand, her eyes, wild, terrified, appealing, look up in his, freighted with their vast petition, while at the same time across the weak, sinking brain flashes a shadow of recognition.

"Pray!" she cries, wildly. "Don't you see that I am dying? My God, what have you to avenge? Death has taken it out of your hands. If you refuse mercy to the dying, what better are you than I?"

Suddenly upon the turbulent, bitter waters of his revengeful soul her words fall like oil. Ay, what better is he than she, if he refuse the dying a prayer? As she has said, death is avenging the slaughter of the innocent. Though if she had lived, he would have swept upon her the full force of his hatred, in death he cannot—dare not—steel his heart against her moaning cry.

"Will you do it?" she whispers. "The Pater noster—once I knew, long years ago. Pater noster—Pater noster—— Oh, my God, I forget the rest! Say it for me?"

With one final struggle with his hate, he complies with her request, and, ere the grand old prayer is finished, her soul has gone forth to meet its God—gone forth with that wailing, bitter cry of "Lenore!"

SUBURBAN HOMES—SHORT HILLS.

NOT twenty miles from the City of New York, on the Morris and Essex Railroad, lies a wooded park, such as one rarely meets with outside of Merrie England. The train, always ascending, passes through a country of marvelous natural beauty, rich in dimpled hills, clad with verdure to the sky line; in picturesque valleys, affording glimpses of vistas of hilltop greenery stretching away to the horizon. The Orange Mountains, dappled with lordly mansions and coquettish villas, rise on the right, and the great wooded plain that sweeps down to the bay, extends its carpet of foliage on the left. Villages nestle in the hills, and idyllic homesteads peep from coignes of vantage all along the route. As the train jauntingly ascends to high altitudes, the keen, buoyant mountain air fills the lungs till one quaffs it like wine.

Fifty minutes from New York and my eyes were attracted by a number of quaint and charming villas dotting a thickly-wooded, hilly park on our right. Now it was a Swiss chalet, now a Norwegian saltr, now a bit of Brittany, now a cottage such as Will Shakespeare bought his bride, Anne Hathaway, to set up housekeeping in; now a specimen of the architecture when Marlborough was winning Blenheim for Queen Anne; now a modern building such as he burly burgomasters of Hamburg love to build on the banks of the green Elbe.

"What exquisite taste!" "How picturesque!" "What delightful homes!" "How I should like to have that one—no, that one!" "What a lovely loca-deal!" These, and kindred exclamations filled the car as it slowed up to a red-brick villa worthy of Twickenham when Pope was writing "The Rape of the Lock." This proved to be a railway station. This exquisite bit of Queen Anne, dedicated to time-tables and all the commercial routine of the iron road? Impossible! And yet so it is. This is the Short Hills Station, built at a cost of $3,000 for the accommodation of the dwellers in the prairie.

I stepped from the train expecting to meet a station-master in a Ramillies wig, and with his stockings rolled over the knees of his fustian inexpressibles, I entered the waiting-room. The surroundings are perfect. Everything is in keeping with the exterior of the building, and so pleasing to the eye that the loss of a train in such a salle d'attente would absolutely count for nothing. Within bowshot of the station is a building having the picturesque stamp of Brittany upon its mediæval tower, and adorned with wooden lattice-work, reminding me of the Traitor's Gate in the Tower of London.

As I stood gazing at this most antique specimen of architecture, I was joined by a gentleman, not yet in the forties, whom I discovered to be Mr. Stewart Hartshorn, the inventor of the patent roller shades that bear his name. Mr. Hartshorn, having amassed a considerable fortune, is now engaged in indulging his idea, of what a perfect suburban place for homes should be, with a result both remunerative and æsthetic. For a considerable period Mr. Hartshorn was on the "look-out" for some picturesque location wherein to commence operations. He required hills and woods, an elevated, healthful situation, and one that would command an extensive prospect—this, too, within forty or fifty minutes of New York. He found it at last at Short Hills—the name is an old historical one and indicating most fittingly the topographical nature of the country—and having purchased several hundred acres, with the command of as many more, he commenced to thin the magnificent trees, to develop picturesque ravines, and to lay down winding and devious roadways, always having an eye to the aptitude of natural vistas. This being done, he cast about for eligible situations for the villas he proposed erecting, and then he built a deep-eaved cottage, just large enough and idyllic enough for a married pair to gush through the honeymoon in. It was instantly pounced upon, and inhabited almost ere the Noah's Ark roof was shingled. A Swiss chalet followed, then came a Norwegian satyr, then an early English dom cile, all cross-beams and blood-red tiles; then a baronial Queen Anne, all corners and gables like an old cocked hat. Many more followed in rapid succession, all differing in shape, the designs for each being by different architects. Some stand on the crests of hills, some in hooded hollows, some in the breezy open; but each is backed by a natural ravine and protected by the extending arms of giant forest trees. There are seventeen of these exquisite houses now adorning Short Hills, and Mr. Hartshorn is now building at a rapid rate, at least twelve being projected for this year. This is far below the demand, but he prefers to build carefully, and in this the element of time is necessary.

"I have given a good deal of attention to the sewerage, and my purpose is to have the place perfectly free from the evil that becomes the curse of thickly settled places. In this direction wells in the midst of the buildings are avoided, and a water supply by steam and wind has been established in the beginning," observed Mr. Hartshorn. "The natural drainage of the hills through yonder rocky ravine suggested to me the idea of having one main sewer to run down it, and to connect the drains of each house with it. That fall would carry away everything."

"Do you rent or sell?" I asked.

"Both. I find that people who rent the villas are anxious to buy. I make the rent low, hence every house is occupied. After I have shown you this hall I will take you through one of the villas in order to let you see what it is like."

The Hall, which is after the design of an old fortress in Brittany, is used for the purpose of amateur theatricals, concerts and lectures. It measures 70 x 50, and its stage is a perfect gem in its way, the drop being in sage-green, relieved by maroon velvet. The fittings are all Eastlake, and the walls and ceiling of stained pine. Some capital scenery, painted by a well-known theatrical artist (Thompson), was being set during our visit.

From the Hall we proceeded to one of the villas, passing en route a stone-crushing machine, by which Mr. Hartshorn crushes a hundred tons of stone per diem for the roads and walks, which are all telfordized as fast as built. The villa was as quaint in shape as an Old World bonnet. The steps were low and long, the piazza deep and covered, the hallway dadoed and panelled in varnished ash, the ceiling panelled in the same wood; the fireplace was open, ornamented with æsthetic tiles of vivid colors, mounted in brass, with fire-dogs and andirons. The staircase was of varnished ash, broken by a short flight of three steps, the balustrades being of ash, unusually thick and grotesquely carved. The dining-room is dadoed, as is also the parlor, while the fireplaces are such as one sees in the old baronial homes of England. The bedrooms are light, airy, and, oh! so cheerful. The kitchen is fit for that Princess in the "Arabian Nights" who manufactured those celebrated cheese cakes. Hot and cold water are laid on, and every convenience at hand from bath to wash tub; and the rent for this perfect specimen of what can be done in the way of æstheticism combined with comfort, $750 per annum. Hear that, ye dwellers in flats, ye renters of grim gaunt brown-stone stoop houses, ye residents of Suburbia—$750! Fifty minutes from Barclay Street Ferry! I was astounded. I live in Brooklyn and pay $1,000—for what? A three story brown-stone front, high stoop. I can't whip a cat in any of the rooms. The staircase is so narrow that after a square meal my mother-in-law takes them sidewise, like a crab. The whitewashed wall a remind one of a penitentiary. I am check-by-jowl with the most disagreeable neighbors. I can hear Jones beating his wife and Mrs. Smith pitching movables at her lego lord. I am forty five minutes from my office, and I pay $1,000 a year, when I could live in an idyllic mansion at Short Hills for $750. My ever-punctual landlord shall hear from me on May 1st.

THE MILITARY REUNION AT ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

THE Military Reunion held in Atlanta, Ga., under the auspices of the Gate City Guard, week before last, was in every way a marked success. The object of the reunion was to bring together representative military organizations of the North and South on a basis of fraternal union and good-will. It was planned and carried out mainly by Captain Burke, of the Guards, who stands among the foremost citizens of Atlanta, and the successful outcome of the festival reflects the highest credit upon his energy and executive ability. The military organizations which took part in the reunion were the Putnam Phalanx, of Hartford, Conn.; Sedgwick Guards, of Waterbury, Conn.; Sherman Cadets, Lawrence, Mass.; Washington Light Infantry, Washington, D. C.; Montgomery Greys, Montgomery, Ala.; Mobile Rifles, Mobile, Ala.; Old Guard, New York City; Floyd Rifles, Macon, Ga.; Richland Rifles and Richland Light Dragoons, of Columbia, S. C.; Estavia Rifles, Eufaula, Ala., and Southern Rifles, of Talbotton, Ga.; Detroit Light Infantry, Detroit, Mich.; Rockford Rifles, Rockford, Ill.; Janesville Guards, Janesville, Wis.; Springfield Guards, Springfield, Ill.; Company B, Second Illinois Regiment, and Companies A and B of Atlanta Grays.

On the evening of October 8th, the festival opened with a grand parade and torchlight procession, the soldiery and citizens participating. Addresses of welcome were made by Governor Colquitt, Mayor Calhoun, and others. The city was gayly decorated; fireworks flashed and shone in showers of light, and along the entire route the streets were thronged with citizens, eager to extend a hearty welcome to the visitors. On the following day the feature was a street parade and review of the visiting and resident military. Three battalions were formed at the encampment, and commanded by Colonel Thomas G. Jones, of the Second Alabama; Colonel W. G. Moore, of the Washington Light Infantry Corps of Washington City, and Major W. J. Heyward, of the Atlanta Grays battalion, marched through the principal streets, amid great enthusiasm. About one o'clock the military reached Oglethorpe Park, where General W. T. Hunt, commandant at the Atlanta Barracks, took formal command of the brigade. At two o'clock Governor Colquitt and staff rode into the park, and were greeted with a salute of seventeen guns by the Fifth Artillery of the Regular Army. The Governor then reviewed the brigade, the companies marching by in splendid style, a battery of the Fifth Artillery bringing up the rear. In all there were upwards of 2,000 soldiers in line, and the review was the grandest ever seen in Atlanta. A local paper describes the review as a scene of great spirit and brilliancy. In the evening of the day there was a reception at the Governor's mansion, which was largely attended.

On the 20th the special attraction was a sham battle at Oglethorpe Park, which was witnessed by some 25,000 persons. Two battalions took part in the battle, one representing the British, commanded by Captain Burke, of the Gate City Guard, and the other representing the Americans, commanded by Captain Du Chesney, of the Sherman Cadets. The Atlanta Grays, Richmond Rifles, of Columbia, S. C., Rockford Rifles, of Illinois, and a battery of the Fifth United States Artillery, made up the British army, while the American army was composed of the Gate City Guard, Sherman Cadets, Janesville Guards, and Mobile Rifles. The battle lasted about twenty minutes, and both armies were well-handled. Each man fired twenty rounds. The battle resulted in a victory for the Americans, who captured the British army. It was intensely exciting and thoroughly enjoyed by the vast crowd.

When the fatigues of the day were over the visitors were entertained at night by the Mystic Owls with a ball and procession. The procession consisted of twelve floats, emblematic of the crusades. The first bore the Mystic Owl and Knights of the Order, and its emblems; the second represented the presentation of the keys of Jerusalem to Charlemagne; the third, Michael, Emperor of Byzantia, with his Empress and attendants, addressing Pope Gregory, as the first advocate of the crusades; the fourth float represented Peter the Hermit preaching the crusade at the foot of the cross; the fifth represented the Council of Clermont, whence the call for the crusade went forth; Pope Urban and attendant bishops were represented surrounded by the representatives of the crusading kings in the costumes of their respective countries; the sixth represented the Count of Toulouse on his bended knee, assuming the cross. A Templar stood in front with drawn sword, and a crusader upheld the frame of the cross. Three princes stood waiting to receive the cross. Following them came twelve mounted knights, leaders of the crusade. The seventh float represented a castle; on its battlements gathered the vassals of a crusader knight; at its windows and doors the ladies of the castle, bidding farewell to the departing lord on his way to the wars. The eighth float represented Manuel, Emperor of Greece, first opponent of the crusade. The ninth represented the followers of the Koran; the tenth the altar of St. Peter and attendant monks; the eleventh Godfrey de Bouillon, first Christian king of Jerusalem, on horseback; the twelfth represented the fate of the Mussulman under the hands of the executioner. The dripping ax, the headless trunk and the severed head were represented with horrible accuracy. The costumes were rich and elegant, and displayed close study and an unusual degree of artistic skill. The effect was highly striking.

On Thursday, the 21st, the corner-stone of the new memorial armory of the Gate City Guards was laid with imposing ceremonies. After this a barbecue was given at the military camp, which was rounded off by speeches full of kindly feeling. Summing up the four days' festival, a correspondent says: "The result of the reunion has been highly gratifying. The visitors expressed themselves highly pleased with their reception, and were warm in expressing their admiration of Atlanta. They left in the best of humor and carried with them enlarged ideas of the resources of the South and the liberal disposition of its people. They promise to do much towards the burial of the bloody shirt. Among the pleasing incidents of the reunion was the meeting of one of the officers of an Illinois company with the ex-Confederate who had captured him in the war, and their festive celebration of the event."

Many of the military visitors from the North embraced the opportunity to search for war relics in the vicinity of Atlanta, as shown in one of our illustrations. As the Rockford Rifles were about to leave the city, Captain Burke passed along the car and "paid off" the visitors in Confederate $5 and $100 bills, to the great merriment of the soldiers and the crowd of spectators.

During the progress of the reunion a Fair was held for the benefit of the Gate City Guards, which attracted thousands of visitors, and was a fine pecuniary success. The proceeds will go to the fund for the erection of the Guards' Memorial Armory.

COMPLETION OF THE COLOGNE CATHEDRAL.

THE present appears to be the fourth cathedral possessed by the City of Cologne. The first is presumed to have been erected by St. Maurus, A. D. 94. A second was commenced by Archbishop Hildebold about the year 819. This was destroyed by fire in 1080; and a third cathedral erected shortly afterwards shared the same fate in 1248, the same year in which the present magnificent structure was commenced by Archbishop Conrad von Hoestaden.

The magnificent choir was completed and consecrated in 1322, and the nave and transepts commenced the same same year under an architect called "Meister Johann," who is supposed to have produced the design for the west front, now hanging up in the cathedral, which has been strictly adhered to in completing the building.

The erection of the nave seems to have been carried on pretty briskly during the fourteenth century, but to have lingered during the fifteenth, and to have been abandoned at the commencement of the sixteenth, probably on account of the religious troubles and disguises of the times. The following is the condition of the cathedral as left by its mediæval builders. The choir with its aisles and sacristy were completed, half of the eastern walls of the transept were carried to their full height, the two northern aisles of the nave as high as the vaulting, the two southern aisles were only completed to the springing of the arches, and the great southwest tower to about one-third of its height.

The whole, except of course the choir, was covered in with temporary roofs, and wonderfully interesting the old building looked in this condition. The grand architectural effect of the completed Cathedral was wanting, yet this was almost made up for by the strange, mysterious appearance of the vast unfinished church, the intense picturesqueness and that wondrous charm which real antiquity seems to give to all buildings. As one entered the low-roofed nave, dark and gloomy, with vast unfinished columns, and then passed through the screen to the magnificent completed choir, with its lofty vaulting and superb stained-glass windows, an impression was left upon the mind quite as lasting as that made by the finished building.

The work of completing the cathedral was commenced in 1842, and brought to a completion on Saturday, August 16th, 1880, the anniversary of the laying of the foundation-stone 632 years before! The outlay since 1821 is stated to have been about $4,500,000, and a German architectural paper has estimated that from first to last $10,000,000 has been expended upon its erection. Some idea of the size of the vast structure may be gained from the following figures. The entire superficial area is about 81,500 feet; Whewell gives the internal area as 62,314, and Westminster Abbey as 32,389. The length of Cologne Cathedral is 480 feet; width across transepts, 220; and the height to the top of the spires, 515 feet, being the loftiest building in the world, and 65 feet higher than the Great Pyramid

How Teas are Adulterated.

IT is pretty generally known that the orthodox teas prepared in the East for American and European consumption are adulterated; but comparatively few people are aware of the extent to which this adulteration is carried on, or what substances are used. M. Hussen, a French chemist of note, has made a thorough investigation of the subject, and the result of his researches has been laid before the Academy of Sciences. He finds that Prussian blue, indigo, and gypsum, in small quantities, are the principal ingredients employed to impart the "face," or "bloom," to teas, and that in the proportions used they are very innocuous. This adulteration takes place where the plants are raised; but more extensive adulteration is subsequently indulged in by the Europeans, who, with their superior knowledge, have surpassed the Asiatics in their fraud by the use of still more dangerous drugs, such as chromate of lead and arsenite of copper, besides making use of comparatively innocuous substances, such as sulphate of iron, steatite, carbonates of lime and magnesia. The Chinese have become most expert in manipulating green teas, which they color with a few simple substances, some of them poisonous—for example, ptarmigan, Prussian blue, curcuma, and kaolin. With or without the true leaf of the shrub they can produce a tea of any desired tint. In order to give the inferior or false leaf the aroma of the tea, the Celestials mix a quantity of it with certain flowers, especially a species of olive. In short, according to M. Hussen, no injurious proceeding is omitted in the Celestial empire to palm on the outer barbarian inferior or false teas. In the leading tea-growing districts the Government has a corps of inspectors who are required to see that the goods are dispatched in a pure state. The precaution, however, avails little, for at the shipping ports there is no attempt to prevent the merchants or brokers from commencing their fraudulent practices, which they carry on to their hearts' content. In spite of their knowledge of the extent to which this adulteration is carried on, we presume our people will continue to drink of the cup which is said to cheer without stealing away a person's brains.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Bureau of French Meteorology has been revived for 1880-81, M. Hervé Mangon being continued president.

Mr. James Blyth, of Edinburgh, has been elected to succeed Professor Forbes in the Chair of Natural Philosophy at Anderson's College, Glasgow.

Mr. Hannay, who has made diamonds, announces that his experiments show that the crystallization of silica (quartz, amethyst, etc.) and of alumina (ruby, sapphire) may be carried on so as to be a commercial success.

The British Museum is about to be enriched by a collection of natural history specimens made by the officers of Her Majesty's surveying ship Alert, which has been for some months engaged in making a complete survey of the Straits of Magellan.

The Russian Newspapers announce that the jubilee of the Zoological Museum of the Academy of Sciences, established in 1831 by the Emperor Nicholas, will take place in 1881. Russian and foreign zoologists will meet at St. Petersburg on this occasion.

The Crayfish is disappearing so rapidly in several French departments that energetic measures have been considered necessary for its protection. The fishing of it has been entirely prohibited in the departments of Meuse and Doubs by prefectural decrees.

The "Revue Industrielle" states that a German manufactory is turning out over a ton a day of glucose made from old linen rags. The process is said to be a cheap one, and the glucose chemically identical with grape sugar, from which very "rich" confections and jellies may be made.

The Vienna Academy of Science proposes as the subject for the Baumgartner prize of 1,000 florins, the microscopic investigation of the wood of living and fossil plants, in order to ascertain whether it is possible to determine with certainty from the examination of the micro copic sections what the genus and species of the plants may have been from which they were taken.

An Englishman named Drake has invented a process for working over old steel which is claimed to be only second in importance to Bessemer's invention, as the new metal possesses extraordinary strength and ductility. The process consists of mixing up old steel with a patent compound, and subjecting the whole to an intense furnace heat, when the particles amalgamate. Steel made on this plan has been tested out at the Russian Works and sold readily for $225 per ton.

The Firm of Bolckow, Vaughan & Co., "Limited," the largest and most important iron and steel masters in the Middlesboro Cleveland district, England, have commenced work extensively under the new process known as the Gilchrist-Thomas process for converting ordinary iron into steel by means of a basic lining in the Bessemer converters. By this process the common ore of the Cleveland district can be made to compete successfully with the Hematite ore of the Barrow district, which, until this complete development of the Gilchrist-Thomas process, was the only ore, except the Bilbao ore of Spain, capable of such conversion. The principle has now proved a perfect success, and the converted rails have stood the severest tests.

The Apparatus for taking flying soundings—an English invention—has attracted much notice from nautical men. It consists of an oval weight of lead, thirty pounds, attached by half a fathom of hemp cord to a ring or thimble properly secured on one end of a length of 200 fathoms of pianoforte wire coiled on an exceedingly light wheel of thin galvanized sheet iron of about a foot in diameter, mounted on a framework fixed in a convenient position on the ship's taffrail. The wheel has a second rim, with a simple kind of friction brake, by which a constant force of five pounds is applied to it when the wire is running out. There is also attached to the same shaft a ratchet wheel and pawl, which can be thrown out of gear or into gear at pleasure. A counter to count up 200 turns completes the apparatus. To take a sounding by it the plan is to let the weight hang by a short cord direct from the wheel and clear of the rail, and then to lift the pawl and throw it out of gear, bending the wheel by hand till ready to begin; then to let go the rim and stand by. The moment the wheel is heard to go slower, the rim is to be laid hold of with both hands, protected by a piece of canvas or thick leather gloves and stopped. It is only necessary to read the counter, and the sounding is complete. Two men, working on handles applied for the purpose, haul in the wire and recover the lead easily and speedily.

MR. SAMUEL J. TILDEN has just purchased a forty-acre tract of land, adjoining Greystone, for a deer park. Mr. Tilden, it is said, has recently been offered $500,000 for his beautiful country home, but he does not wish to sell it.

GENERAL COUNT VON MOLTKE, Chief Marshal of the Empire, has received the title of Prince, offered him by the Emperor of Germany on the occasion of the eightieth anniversary of the Count's birth, which occurred on October 26th.

MONUMENTS to Rousseau and Millet are to be erected in the Forest of Fontainebleau. They will consist of bronze busts placed on rocks in the forest. M. Chrétien's bust of Rousseau will be used, while Chapu will execute that of Millet.

A PINK marble shaft, to be erected as a monument to the late Confederate General Albert Sidney Johnson, has arrived from Italy, at Houston, Texas. The monument was purchased with a fund raised several years ago by the ladies of Houston.

THE King of Denmark uses on state occasions a breed of pure white horses, which are national property. They are descended from a white stallion and a white mare presented to King Christian IV. by the Dey of Algiers. The breed has been raised in the royal establishment near Copenhagen for nearly 200 years.

THE little Princess Paulina of Holland was taken to church for her baptism in a carriage drawn by six horses. She was received at the door by the ecclesiastical authorities and carried up the aisle to the young Queen, her mother, who, showing much emotion, presented her for baptism, herself acting as godmother.

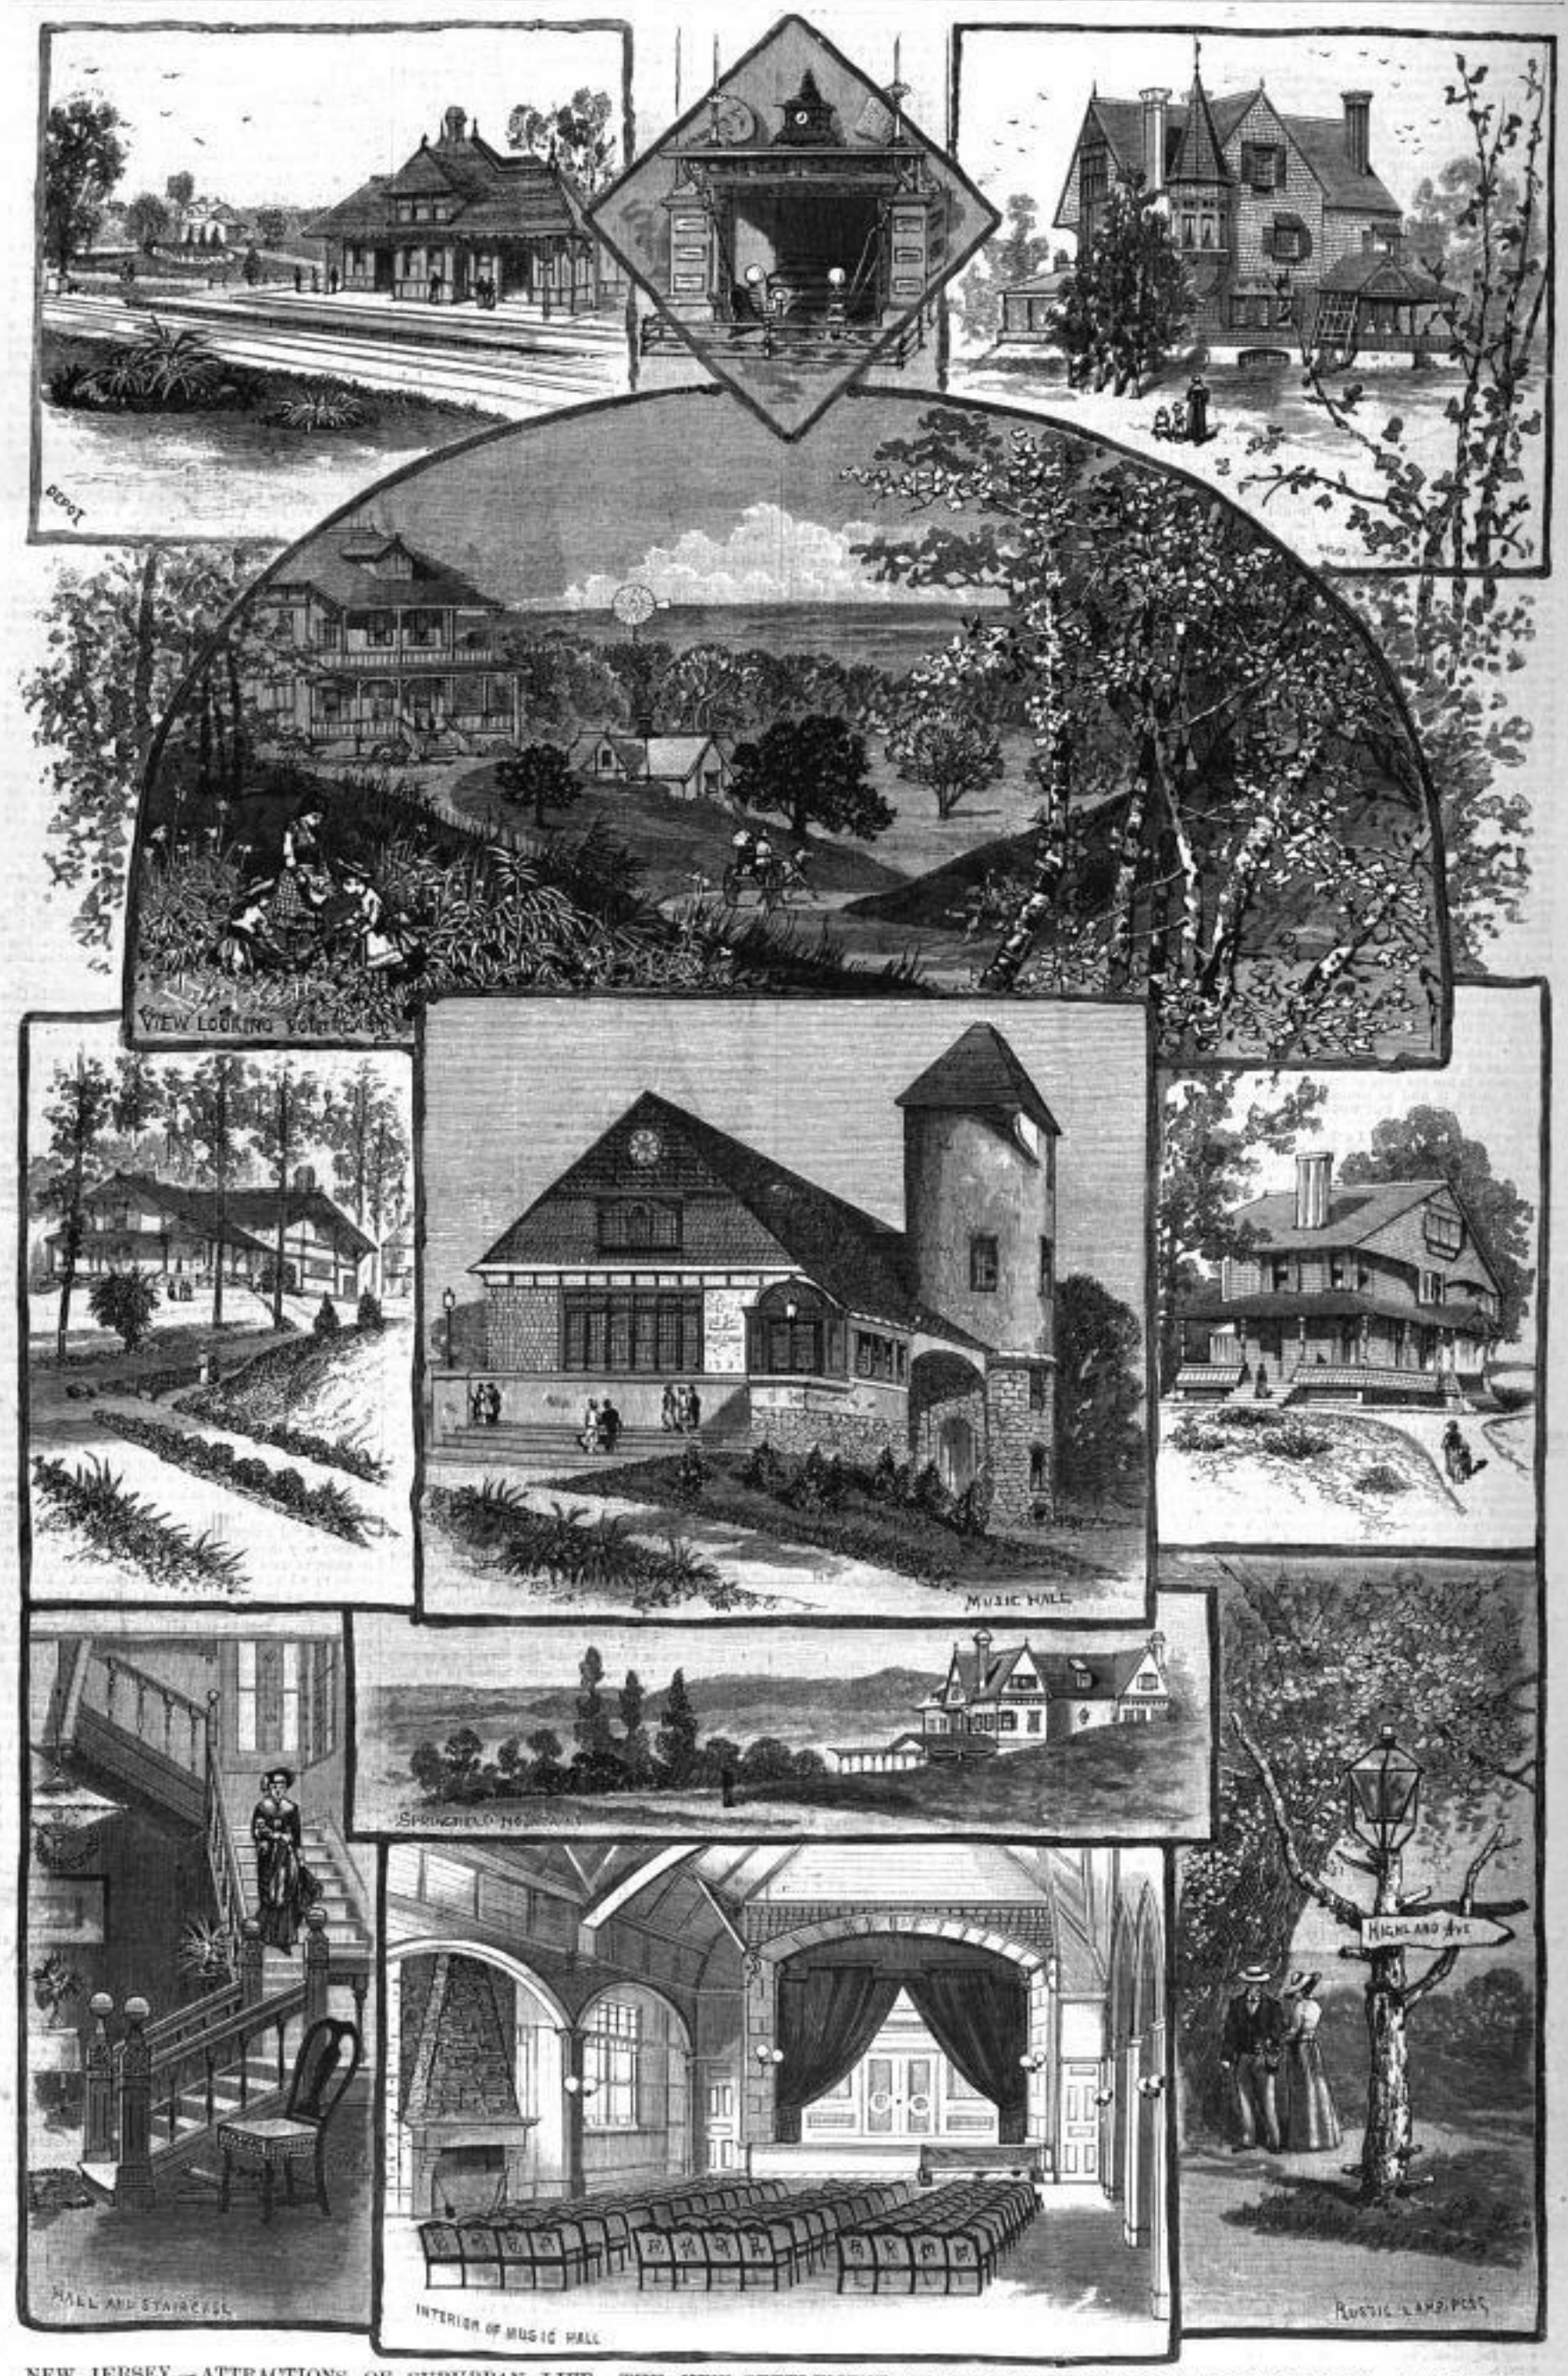
MISS ELIZABETH THOMPSON, the well-known philanthropist, has made a liberal contribution for the publication of the "History of Woman Suffrage in the United States" which Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Matilda Joslyn Gage and Susan B. Anthony are compiling. Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony will spend the Winter at Mrs. Stanton's New Jersey cottage.

THE erection of a monument to perpetuate the labors of Thomas Clarkson as an advocate of slave emancipation was begun last week, at Wisbeach, Eng., when the first stone of a handsome memorial was laid. The memorial will be a statue, with an inscription and bas-reliefs. It was designed by the late Sir Gilbert Scott, and will cost $10,000, of which $3,000 are still required.

THE pretty Princess Stephanie will arrive in Vienna on February 11th. On the succeeding three days magnificent public fêtes will be given, and on the 15th the young Belgian's marriage to Prince Rudolph will be celebrated. The Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the royal family will go over for the ceremony, and the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany will also be present.

LORD RAWTON formerly Mr. Montague Corry, still remains with Lord Beaconsfield, rarely leaving him for a day. The young secretary cannot be said to serve his patron for salary alone, for he is a man of independent means and a member of an excellent Irish family. But in spite of his money, he is to be made still more fortunate: it is rumored that he is to inherit the ex-Premier's entire property, including Hughenden Manor.

STRANGE reports are current in St. Petersburg in regard to the indisposition of the Emperor. It is whispered that, despite all precautions taken by his household, the Nihilists have succeeded in poisoning him. Two of the imperial cooks have, it is stated, been arrested on suspicion. Another report is that the stroke of paralysis which the Czar recently sustained has affected his brain. Hopes of his recovery, however, have not been abandoned.



THE aged Emperor of Germany is described as looking very imposing when, with his wife on his arm, he emerged from the venerable cathedral at Cologne followed by a long train of princes and generals. He took his place in a pavilion prepared on the platz, and signed a record which, after having been also signed by sixty-seven German princes and notabilities, was placed in a long silver tube and given over to the workmen to be deposited in the principal stone cross at the top of the cathedral spire, 530 feet above.

COUNT HARRY ARNIM is about to return to Berlin, relying on Dr. Simon's official certificate that any imprisonment would be almost fatal to the ex-Ambassador's shattered health. The Count is said to be sadly broken in health, and is eager to clear himself of the charge of treason. One touching phase of Count Arnim's life is the devotion shown to him by his wife and children, and which could not even be for a moment shaken by the humiliation he had to endure. Baron Arnim Schlagenthin, his only son, who, notwithstanding a temporary estrangement from his father previous to the latter's imprisonment, manfully stood by his side when the officers of the law were persecuting the Count, has just been married to the daughter of one of the most highly-respected Italian noblemen.

DR. JOHN A. PADDOCK, whose nomination as Missionary Bishop of Washington Territory has been confirmed by both houses of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, is one of the best known and most widely honored clergymen of Brooklyn, where he has rendered long and faithful service as the rector of St. Peter's Church. His health has been somewhat impaired during the last two years, so that it became necessary for him at one time to suspend his labor and go abroad for needed rest. If his health will permit him to undertake the arduous labors of a missionary bishop, he will not be the man to shirk the responsibilities of his new office, and his friends and parishioners in parting with him will know that in breaking off the social ties of a lifetime he is doing what he considers his simple duty. Dr. Paddock and his brother, the present Bishop of Massachusetts, lived for many years within a few blocks of each other in Brooklyn.

OBITUARY.—The Hon. E. D. Mansfield, a newspaper writer and author, well-known as the "Veteran Observer," died October 27th, at Yarmouth, Ohio, in his 86th year; Bishop D. S. Doggett, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, on the 27th, at Richmond, Va., aged 70; Alexandre-Marie Guilemin, the French painter, on the 27th, at Paris, aged 63; Georges Pierson, a remarkable young scientific discoverer and writer, at Paris, aged 29; Henri Frederic Schopin, the French historical painter, at Paris, aged 77; Dr. Edouard Seguin, the celebrated specialist in the treatment of idiocy and the allied nervous diseases, at New York, on October 28th, aged 68.

ABDURRAHMAN KHAN, THE NEW AMEER OF CABUL, RECENTLY REPORTED MURDERED.

ABDURRAHMAN KHAN.

A DISPATCH was received in London from Peshawur, dated October 26th, announcing that anarchy reigns in Cabul, and that the Ameer has been murdered. Although the Indian office has received no confirmation of the report, the authority is undoubted.

Abdurrahman Khan, the new Ameer of Cabul, was a grandson of Dost Mahomed, being the eldest son of his eldest son, Afzul Khan. As, however, Eastern rulers are not wont to be guided by the law of primogeniture in their choice of a successor, but elect their favorite son as their heir, Dost Mahomed nominated the late Shere Ali, who accordingly ascended the throne on his father's death in 1863. At that time Afzul Khan was Governor of Balkh, and, together with his brother Azim Khan and his son Abdurrahman, headed an insurrection and drove Shere Ali from Cabul. Afzul was then acknowledged Ameer, his success being in a great measure due to the military prowess of Abdurrahman, who had defeated Shere Ali's troops on several occasions, and noteworthy at Shaikpore. Afzul Khan died in 1867, was succeeded by Azim Khan, while Abdurrahman retired to Balkh. Shere Ali, however, in his turn, raised an army, and, defeating both the new Ameer and Abdurrahman, occupied Cabul, and was acknowledged Ameer. Abdurrahman fled to Bokhara, and took refuge with his father-in-law, the Ameer, and from that time until the close of last year he remained there under Russian protection. Upon the deposition of Yakoob Khan, however, he crossed the Russian frontier, and, organizing a small force in Turkestan, slowly advanced towards Cabul. As he was known to be a man of considerable intelligence and force of character, and as Afghanistan eminently needed such a man for its ruler, the Indian Government opened negotiations with him, which resulted in the recognition of his claims to the throne, and he was publicly acknowledged Ameer in a durbar held in Cabul on July 22d last. He was described by those who had seen him as a fine, handsome man, about forty years of age.

VICE-ADMIRAL SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR.

IN the international fleet now riding at anchor in the Adriatic, fully prepared to enforce the decisions of the Berlin Congress, England is represented by the ironclads Alexandra and Temeraire, the gun-vessel Condor and the dispatch boat Helicon; Russia by the Nestane, familiar to our readers owing to her trip to this country with the Grand Duke Alexis, and the Jemtchoug; Austria by the ironclad Custozza, and the ships London, Prinz Eugen and Strongie; France by the Friedland, Suffren, and the dispatch-boat Hirondelle; Germany by the corvette Victoria, and Italy by the new ironclad Palestro and the Roma.

The entire squadron is under the supreme command of the British Vice-Admiral, Sir Michael Seymour, G.C.B. He is a son of the late Admiral Sir M. Seymour, Bart., was born in 1802, educated at the Royal Naval College, and admitted to the navy in 1813. During his long service, Lord Seymour has been superintendent of the dock-yards at Sheerness and Devonport, and Commander-in-Chief of the East India and China Station. In 1834 he was made Captain of the Baltic fleet, and for his services against the Russians there, a K.C.B., while for his labors during the naval operations on the Chinese coast between 1856 and 1858 he was honored with a G.C.B. He was Admiral in command at Portsmouth from 1863 to 1866. In 1874 he was appointed Vice-Admiral of the United Kingdom.

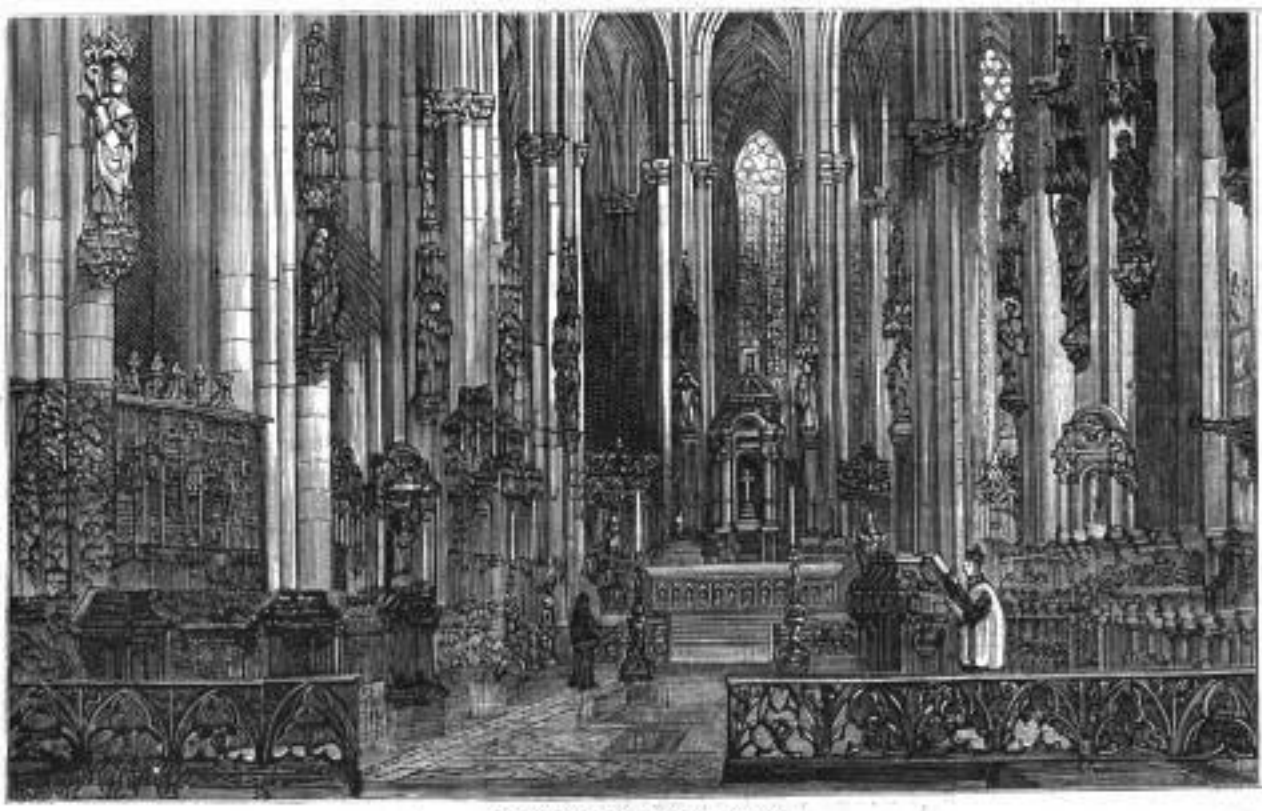
Since the formation of the allied fleet for the present delicate service, Sir Michael has shown cool judgment and marked tact. He has several times made long journeys inland to confer personally both with the Montenegrin Prince and Riza Pasha, the Turkish commander charged with the execution of the Sultan's tardy decree. He is instructed to confer with the admirals of the other Great Powers, but in case of hostile action he is expected to take the initiative.

VICE-ADMIRAL LORD SEYMOUR, COMMANDER OF THE INTERNATIONAL FLEET IN THE ADRIATIC.

ARCHITECTURAL PROGRESS OF NEW YORK CITY.

NEW QUARTERS OF THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB.

THE new building of the Union League Club is located at the northeast corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street. The width is 84 feet, and the depth 152 feet. The materials are Philadelphia brick and Longmeadow brown-stone, with granite base. The entrance, flanked by massive brown pillars, is on the Thirty-ninth Street side, leaving an unbroken line of large windows in the Fifth Avenue front.



The main features of the building are the great dining-hall, the picture gallery, the great assembly-hall, which can be used for public meetings or theatrical entertainments, and the library. It will be observed that the kitchen department is at the top of the building, whereby there will be no danger of the odors from that necessary but often offensive department permeating the other rooms of the house.

On the first floor the cashier's and reception-rooms are directly at hand on entering the building; the dressing-rooms are very large, with coat-rooms, wash-rooms, and all conveniences. The coat-room can be enlarged on any crowded night by opening into it one section of the reading-room. The public entrance opens on a staircase, intended mainly as a public approach to the hall and picture-gallery, but of fireproof construction to the top of the building, and affording a ready escape from every story. The billiard-room is at the east end of the building, is lighted from each end, and ventilated by a shaft in each corner. One end of it, behind an open screen, is reserved as the coffee-room. Adjoining this is the wine-serving room, with a lift to the wine-cellar below. At the entrance to the billiard room stairs go down directly to the barber's-room and bowling alleys.

The public stairs give convenient separate access to the picture-gallery and large hall on the second floor. The latter is approached handsomely from the club-house through the picture-gallery. A service-room, in a half-story, beneath the north end of the gallery, will connect, by the back stairs and elevator, with the kitchen and rest of the house, and serve on occasions of large dinners, or as a retiring-room for people appearing on the stage. The picture-gallery is not only lighted from the top, but the light area is in its larger portion entirely open to the north, as none of the club-house closes it, and it is opposite the yard of the adjoining Fifth Avenue house. There are on this floor three conversation-rooms, and three more directly over them, entered from the landing of the stairs. The library is planned to have a grained plaster ceiling, and two of the sections are arranged to close off with sliding doors, so that one or both may serve for Executive Committee meetings if desired, and also, on occasion, for a ladies' cloak room, for which reason a dressing-room is placed near by.

The third story is wholly devoted to chambers, etc.

On the fourth floor is the main dining-hall, finished up into the roof, showing open timber-work, like the Commons Halls in Oxford and elsewhere. Three small dining-rooms, to be used together or separately as desired, adjoin the main room on the south, and on the north of the building is a large dining-room, which can be still further enlarged by the use, on occasion, of a passage adjoining, and also, when desirable, be connected with the great dining-hall. The rest of the story is devoted to chambers.

The kitchen, on the fifth story, adjoins the service-stairs and the freight elevator, and such dumb-waiters as may be placed by it. Stairs and dumb-waiter connect it with the serving and carving-room just below, at the end of the great dining hall. Cooks' and house-keepers' departments surround the kitchen and the rest of the story is used for chambers, approached both by the fire-proof stairs and another flight.

The sixth story contains the laundry and servants' dining-room, both near the elevator.

One entrance to the basement, for members of the club, leads to the barber's shop and bowling-alleys, which can also be approached from the club itself. Also, there is a special entrance for the servants. The rest of the basement is used for servants' rooms, store-rooms, etc.

In accordance with the New York Building Law, the structure will have an iron roof.

The cost is estimated at $250,000.

Development in Dress.

HOW DID we come to possess our present form of dress? This is one of the many questions answered by a reviewer in the Nation. Clothing at first was almost entirely ornamental. The exceptions were such articles as belts, from which instruments of various kinds could be suspended so as to be ready for use while the hands were left free. A savage does not enjoy the luxury of a pocket. Even at the present day a Japanese has to sling his tobacco-pipe and pouch from his belt, and the only pockets he has are in his sleeves. The simple cincture was the germ, so to speak, of the clothing we wear. After some time a bunch of pandanus slips was added in front, and this was gradually extended until it made a complete fringe around the body. When the arts became so far advanced that man could make paper cloth or some woven material, these latter were substituted for the primitive fringe, and the kilt was thus developed. Curiously enough, the dress of the Scottish Highlanders embodies these two stages of progress in the kilt and the sporran. As man advanced there were the conveniences attending the use of the kilt, which were abated by fastening that garment at one point between the legs, and the human mind was then fairly set upon the path to arrive at the attainment of a pair of trousers. When the back and shoulders needed protection the savage used the skin of some animal, and it is from this sort of covering for the upper part of the body that we have derived our coats, vests, shirts, etc. But the ancient cloak form is even yet retained, not only by such people as Zulu chiefs, but in all robes of ceremony by dignitaries of court and college of the most highly civilized nations on the face of the earth. The elaborate and varied head-coverings of the present day all sprang from a very simple original type.

The Electric Light.

THERE is no question now among the most conservative of engineers that this time the electric light has come to stay. Perhaps as yet the most extensive use of this light in any one establishment is that in the Royal Albert Dock, London, an extension of the Victoria Docks, which covers eighty acres of water space, and has nearly eight miles of quays. The lamps used are the Siemens pendulum kind, with the body of the lamp above the arc, and the carbons so regulated that the position of the arc is fixed. Each lamp is placed on the top of a pole 80 feet high, and its effective illumination overlaps that of its neighbors. To generate the electricity, the Siemens "D 2" dynamo-machine, are employed, one to each lamp. The Engineering says that the most interesting feature of the sets of generators is that the whole of the available current generated in each machine is conveyed to its corresponding lamp, none being utilized and absorbed in its passage for exciting the field magnets. In order to do this a separate dynamo-machine, specially constructed, is employed, the current developed by which is transmitted through the magnet coils of all the illuminating machines in series. By this arrangement, the essential principle of which was first conceived and announced by Mr. Henry Wilde, of Manchester, motive power is economized and greater constancy of current is insured. It is reported that the illumination of the dock, with its quays and surroundings, is very perfect, and that the effect is most beautiful. Between the machines and the lamps the distances vary from 120 to 1,100 yards.

Public Libraries in Europe.

ACCORDING to a Viennese statistical journal, Austria is better provided with public libraries than any other country in Europe. There are altogether 377 libraries in Austria, containing collectively 5,675,798 volumes, exclusive of maps and manuscripts: this is an average of 26.8 volumes per 100 inhabitants. The 500 libraries of France possess 4,598,000 volumes and 135,000 manuscripts, or 12.5 volumes per 100 of the population: Italy has 493 libraries, 4,349,281 volumes and 230,370 manuscripts, equal to 15.2 per 100 inhabitants: Prussia has 398 libraries, 2,640,651 volumes and 58,000 manuscripts; equal to 11 volumes per 100. Great Britain has 300 libraries, 2,671,493 volumes and 26,000 manuscripts; Bavaria has 169 libraries, with 1,368,800 volumes and 24,000 manuscripts, a number which places that country next to Austria as regards the number of volumes per head of population; Russia has 145 libraries, 902,000 books and 24,300 manuscripts, equal to 1.3 volumes per 100 persons. Of separate institutions the National French Library is the largest, containing 2,078,000, or nearly half the total contents of the 500 libraries of the country; the British Museum comes next with 1,000,000 volumes, then the Royal Munich Library, 810,000; the Berlin Library, 700,000; that at Dresden, 500,000; at Vienna, 420,000. The Oxford University Library (300,000) outnumbers the National Belgian Library by 90,000 volumes; the Heidelburg University Library has also 300,000; so has the Hamburg town library, and that at Stuttgart. The library of the Vatican at Rome is small, comparatively, having only 30,000 volumes; but it is rich in manuscripts, which number 25,000.

THE THEATRES.

UNION SQUARE THEATRE.—"Daniel Rochat" is one of the most powerful pieces ever put upon the boards of this admirably-appointed theatre. The situations are supremely exciting, and the acting all round such as must needs satisfy the critical and æsthetic audiences which nightly crowd to witness the performance.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—"Opera night" means hundreds of carriages blocking up Fourteenth Street, and "miles away" into Third Avenue, while thousands of the lovers of music at its best occupy every available space in the gorgeously decorated opera house. Gerster never was in finer voice, and Stavelli has made an impression such as is not usually accorded to tenors on so short an acquaintance. As for Campanini, who, despite his hoarseness, resolves not to disappoint the public, he is Campanini, and this is saying all that need be said.

BOOK NOTICE.

THE LOYAL RONINS: A Historical Romance. Translated from the Japanese of Tamenaga Shunsui by Shiuichiro Saito and Edward Greey. New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons. 1880.

"The Loyal Ronins," Mr. Greey informs us in his preface, is one of seven stories written by Tamenaga Shunsui (For the sake of perpetual spring-water), and published under the title of I-ro-ha Bunko (the A, B, C writing-desk) Tamenaga, the Charles Dickens of Japan, is the founder of the modern school of Nihonese fiction, and, taking it for granted that his Japanese world was thoroughly acquainted with the story of the forty-seven ronins, as doubtless it is, a literal translation would have only led the other world into devious and inextricable labyrinths, had not Mr. Greey—for on him has fallen the heat and burden of the day—collaborated with his friend Saito, with a result at once highly instructive, and interestingly amusing. Mr. Greey's long residence amongst the Japs, and his thorough knowledge of their inner life and language, has enabled him to produce a series of pictures as vivid as the colors in the charming frontispiece of his book, and, taking up the work with a languid curiosity, the reader becomes gradually interested, until, like a child at a pantomime, he dreads the rapidly approaching fall of the curtain. It is not our province to tell the story of "The Loyal Ronins." Mr. Greey narrates it in a manner that must command a good word from all who can discriminate between careful workmanship and inartistic looseness. The book is a perfect gem in its way, quaint, bizarre and gotten up with æsthetic elegance, the letter-press making in itself a picture. The illustrations—and they are very numerous—are admirable specimens of art, and possess the ring of the true Japan metal. We cordially recommend "The Loyal Ronins," and eagerly look forward to further instalments of Nihonese literature from the pen of Mr. Greey and his accomplished collaborateur, Shiuichiro Saito.

FUN.

WHY is the discovery of the North Pole like an illicit whisky manufactory? Because it's a secret still.

FARMERS in Portugal plow with sticks and hoe corn with boards, because their fathers and grandfathers did. Filial affection could go no further.

"CAN I give my son a college education at home?" asked a fond parent. Certainly. All you want is a baseball guide, a racing shell and a pack of cigarettes.

FATHER: "Charley, I see no improvement in your marks." Charley: "Yes, papa; it is high time you had a serious talk with the teacher, or else he'll keep on that way forever."

STREET PREACHER: "I now ask, brethren, what can I do to move you—what shall I do to move you in this world of wickedness?" Jerry: "Send round the 'at, gov'nor, that'll move 'em."

A CERTAIN English General, being at the point of death, opened his eyes, and seeing a consultation of four physicians who were standing close by his bedside, faintly exclaimed: "Gentlemen, if you dare by platoons it's all over with me," and instantly expired.

WHEN the man who has been back from the country a few weeks discovers in a hack-driver whom he employs the "old hermit of the cave" he used to visit on the hill near the Summer resort he patronized, he is apt to set the landlord down as a villain.

"ANY good shooting on your farm?" asked the hunter of a farmer. "Splendid," replied the agriculturalist; "there's a drive-well man down in the clover meadow, a cloth peddler at the house, a candidate out in the barn, and two tramps down in the stock-yard. Climb right over the fence, young man, load both barrels and call in."

A GENTLEMAN met his little son on the street and asked him how they were all coming on at home. "Pretty-rate. Mamma has made you a whole new shirt." "Tell mamma when I come home I'll give her a nickel." "Better give it to me." "You didn't make the shirt?" "If I hain't kept my eye on her she would have been leaning over the fence talking about the fashions instead of working. I ought to be encouraged some, anyhow."

A COUPLE of old darkies met the other day and began talking over matters and things. "How is ole Colonel Jones comin' on, what used to own you before de war? He is so ole he must be gettin to be childish and losin' his reasonin' powers." "Don't know nuffin' about him—hain't seed him since befoah last Christmas." "Why, what's de matter?" "Ain't got no use for such ole gemmans. Last time I was dar I fotched him a big reddish I had cotched. I tole him if he would gimme a table knife I would scrape an' clean de fish. What do you s'pose he sed?" "Ask-d yer to come in and get a dram, and chat a while about ole times on de ole plantation." "No, sah; he tole me if I couldn't borry a table knife from some ob de nabors dat he would rudder clean de fish himself. I s'pose he was afeared I'd be keerless in handin' de knife back when I got done wid it." The other darkey rubbed his chin and remarked: "I see by dat ar dat de ole man's still got de use of his reasonin' powers."

ANGOSTURA BITTERS do not only distinguish themselves by their flavor and aromatic odor above all others generally used, but they are also a sure preventive for all diseases originating from the digestive organs. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

THE ST. NICHOLAS is conducted as a strictly first-class Hotel, on the American plan, and especially for patronage of transient guests. The location is central and convenient for pleasure or business, and its elegant suites of rooms for families and bridal parties are an especial attraction.

THE great advantage of the genuine Ash ite Covering for Steam Pipes, Boilers, etc., over any other forms of non-conducting coverings, aside from their superior effectiveness and fireproof qualities, is that they are manufactured in convenient form, ready for use, and can be easily applied without the aid of skilled labor. The H. W. Johns' M'f'g Co., 87 Maiden Lane, New York, are the possessors and sole manufacturers. ☞ All infringements will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS Liquid Paints

are strictly pure linseed oil paints of a higher grade than have ever before been manufactured for structural purposes. They are sold by United States standard gallon measure, and although they command a higher price than any other paints, a saving of 25 to 35 per cent. of customary outlays can be effected by their use, in consequence of their wonderful covering properties and superior durability.

The finest and most expensive structures in this country are painted with these paints, among others the United States Capitol at Washington, the Metropolitan Railroad of New York, etc.

Samples of twenty-eight newest shades for dwellings sent free by mail.

☞ Be sure and get the Genuine, which are manufactured only by

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS Roof Paints.

These are strictly first-class Paints, prepared ready for use, in six colors, especially for preserving Tin and other roofs. They possess a very elastic body and are not liable to injury from being walked upon. They are also superior to the best white lead paints for Out-buildings, Fences, Shingle Roofs and other rough wood-work, Brick Walls, Iron Work, etc., while they cost only about half as much.

☞ We guarantee these to be better and more economical Paints than have ever before been offered to the public for similar purposes.

KIDNEY-WORT

This Great Remedy acts at the same time on the diseases of the LIVER, BOWELS & KIDNEYS.

This combined action gives it wonderful power to cure all disease.

WHY ARE WE SICK?

Because we allow these great organs to become clogged or torpid, and poisonous humors are therefore forced into the blood that should be expelled naturally.

KIDNEY-WORT WILL CURE

BILIOUSNESS, PILES, CONSTIPATION, KIDNEY COMPLAINTS, URINARY DISEASES, FEMALE WEAKNESS, AND NERVOUS DISORDERS, by arousing first action of these organs and restoring their power to throw off disease.

Why Suffer Bilious pains and aches! Why tormented with Piles, Constipation! Why frightened over disordered Kidneys! Why endure nervous or sick headaches! Why have sleepless nights!

Use KIDNEY-WORT and rejoice in health.

It is put up in Dry Vegetable Form, in tin cans one package of which makes six quarts of medicine. Also in Liquid Form, very Concentrated, for those that cannot readily prepare it. It acts with equal efficiency in either form.

GET IT OF YOUR DRUGGIST. PRICE, $1.00.

THE GREAT RESULT.

IN the veracious chronicle of the "Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent.," we are favored with a disquisition on the long chapter of "chances" which the events of this world lay open to us. The chapter of chances is a particularly long one in the records of each political campaign, when politicians of the one side and of the other seek to catch the shadows of coming events by forecasting all manner of calculations and prognostics which are based rather on their respective wishes and imaginations than on the solid ground of facts. The counting of the ballots at the end of the contest is a signal for the collapse of many illusions which the political fancy has practiced upon itself and upon the credulous mind of all who allow their opinions to jump with their inclinations.

But when the October elections were held in Ohio and Indiana it was admitted, by general consent, that in the outcome of those elections we might descry a shadow of the coming event which had not yet risen upon the horizon of history; and now that that event has come to cast its shadow after it, we see that the augury was as just as it was universal. The Presidential election of 1880 has resulted in the triumph of the Republican Party, which, in the person of its candidate, General Garfield, is again charged with the Executive Administration of the Government.

The fugiemen and managers of the defeated party will, of course, be as prolific in pessimistic explanations of this, to them, disagreeable result as lately they were prolific in the vaticinations of a hopeful optimism. It will be ascribed to a thousand minor and major causes—as, for instance, the omission to renominate Mr. Tilden; the relegation of the "fraud issue" to a subordinate place in the canvass; the political inexperience of General Hancock; the personal unpopularity of Mr. English; the indiscreet utterances of General Wade Hampton and others; the injudicious management of the National Democratic Committee; the inordinate use of personal charges against the private character of General Garfield; and, finally, to the forgery of crooked weapons which turned into boomerangs in the hands of those who wielded them.

All these minor and major causes may deserve to be enumerated, and more besides, in an exhaustive analysis of the multiform and multiplex antecedents which, as they enter, according to the circumstances of each case, into the resultant issue of every political campaign, so they may be fairly assumed to have had their share in determining the aggregate result of the present election. But they who search for the great "bottom fact" which lies under all these minor or major causes (the fact which gave to these secondary causes all their potency for mischief against the aspirations of the Democrats) will find it in the purely negative attitude which the Democrats have been obliged to assume throughout the whole of the present canvass, because they were absolutely destitute of clear opinions, deliberate resolutions, strong convictions and definite policies with regard to all the pending public questions which are of most immediate and vital interest to the prosperity of the country. Hence it is that the best-delivered attacks which the Democratic champions have made upon the weaknesses and faults of the Republicans have fallen short of their purpose for the simple and sufficient reason that the Democrats offered no body of doctrine to take the place of alleged heresies in the Republican creed, and no system of measures to take the place of alleged blunders and shortcomings in the Republican administration of the Government. And so it has inevitably come to pass that the vigor with which the Democrats began their canvass perished from pure inanition, and wasted itself in futile and aimless blows on the air.

With the exception of Mr. Bayard and his political associates, the Democrats seems to have forgotten that a two-fold office devolves upon the members of every opposition party; it is called to watch the party in power, and if it is to supersede that party in the control of the Government, it is bound to invent a better system of political measures, and then to educate the public mind and the public conscience into the acceptance of that better system. The first half of this duty the Democrats have performed with zeal, if not always with discretion, but the latter half of this duty they have left as absolutely out of all account as if, like the angels of heaven, they were mere spectators of human strifes and passions. The people, therefore, have simply taken them at the only value of which they have given any proof, and that the people place a high estimate on this value is demonstrated by the fact that they have still retained the Democrats in the place and function of an opposition sufficiently powerful to act as a check on the Republicans. What more could they have done than this? To have given the control of the Government to the Democrats without knowing what the Democrats wanted to do with it, and without the Democrats themselves knowing their own mind and wishes, would have argued a blind faith in the mere caprices and chances of Democratic opinion. It is, therefore, well for the country, well for the Republicans, and well for the Democrats, that the latter have been charged with the responsibilities of a watching opposition until they shall have fitted themselves for the higher duties of administration, by digesting a better set of measures and offering better methods of rule than those adopted and practiced by the Republican Party.

LOSING OUR PROVISION TRADE.

IT is a fact that admits of no dispute that serious inroads on the provision trade of New York are being made by the practice, so common at the present time, of shipping meats and lard from the West on through bills of lading to foreign ports. The value of this trade to the country is made sufficiently clear when it is stated that the exports of bacon alone from the United States during the nine months ending September 3d were worth over $42,000,000; that the value of the lard exports for the same time exceeded $23,000,000, and that the total value of the exports of bacon, lard, pork and beef for the period named was in exact figures $73,229,111. The evil complained of by our merchants is the discriminations against New York which are made both by the railroads and the ocean steamship companies. From Chicago to New York the rate for provisions is nominally 35 cents per hundred pounds, while from Chicago to Liverpool on through bills of lading it ranges from 63 to 74 cents, leaving New York at a serious disadvantage, inasmuch as there is generally a difference of from five to seven cents per hundred pounds in favor of the shipper who sends his consignments on the through bills of lading. It is asserted that the railroads "cut" their rates, sometimes taking off as much as one-half, and that the steamship companies, through their agents at the West, give rates which would not be granted to exporters here.

And this is not only the case, but we have not even the small satisfaction of having the goods passed through New York. Notwithstanding the large increase in the exports of provisions from the country at large, the shipments from New York show a decrease. Taking the most important article, bacon, we find that the exports since January 1st have been 391,000,000 pounds, against something over 411,000,000 pounds for the corresponding period last year, while the actual receipts here were smaller than last year. The merchants of New York are thoroughly alive to these facts, and yet little or nothing is being done to turn the tide in our favor. It will not do to rest content with the fact that the value of the exports from our port is much larger than last year; for, while that is true, it is owing solely to the fact that prices of most provisions have advanced fully twenty-five per cent. within six months, and the actual receipts here, as already stated, have been smaller than last year.

Boston is one of our greatest rivals in this trade. The shipments thence have nearly doubled this year, and seem likely to go on increasing. Then there is Baltimore, with its splendid terminal facilities, which is not to be despised as a competitor, and Philadelphia is another dangerous rival. All these cities have better terminal facilities than those possessed by New York. Shippers in Chicago are also beginning to send large consignments by way of Montreal, which is a thousand miles nearer than New York to some continental ports to which shipments are being made. Sending provisions by way of the Lachine Canal and Grand Trunk Railroad to Montreal on through bills of lading is a practice which is steadily increasing. The expenses of lighterage at New York, as well as the commission charges and other heavy expenses, have driven away an important percentage of the trade, and will assuredly work still further injury if some means are not devised to bring the trade back. As it now stands, many of the large firms here have been compelled to establish branch houses in the West. It may be said that thus practically ignoring New York in this trade hurts no one but the "middlemen." This is an illusive argument, since a large number of poorer men must necessarily suffer by the change.

However, not to draw too gloomy a picture, it may be safely stated that, notwithstanding all the efforts of her rivals, New York must always hold a high position in this and other branches of trade. The consumption of provisions here is large, and we have more capital than any other city in the Union with which to carry on the trade. The wealth of New York City is indeed almost fabulous, and this with her splendid harbor will make it impossible to entirely ignore the metropolis of this continent. The valuation of real and personal property in this city was last stated at $1,094,069,385, which was greater than the combined wealth of twenty-one States and Territories, among which are Maine, Vermont, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Minnesota, North Carolina, Nevada and Colorado, with their vast mineral wealth. Taking the States separately, New York City has more wealth than any State in the Union with only four exceptions. Our wharves and piers around the city are valued at over $13,000,000, and would be worth more if freight cars could be taken to the steamship wharves and the heavy lighterage expenses thus obviated. Finally it may be stated, as one hopeful feature of our provision trade, that some of the large exporters here prefer to have their consignments sent to New York on local bills of lading, so that their own inspectors can inspect the stock before it is shipped to foreign ports.

THE NEXT CONGRESS.

THE next House of Representatives will undoubtedly be Republican by a majority of from ten to twelve. Among the conspicuous gains of the Republicans are three in Missouri, one in Louisiana, one in South Carolina, two in Tennessee, and one in Virginia, making eight in the Southern States. Two districts in Iowa were rescued from the Greenbackers, securing a solid Republican delegation from that State. In Pennsylvania a Republican carries the Scranton District, heretofore represented by the famous Labor Reformer, Hendrick B. Wright. There are other gains, with some losses, the net result being a solid Republican majority, which will give that party control of the House, and make it responsible for its legislation. As to the next Senate, the indications are that it will be a tie, though it is possible that later returns may give the Legislature of Tennessee to the Democrats, and so secure that party a majority of one.

Among the questions which the new Congress will be called to consider, unless it shall be disposed of at the closing session of the present Congress, is that of the reapportionment of Congressional representation during the next ten years, beginning with the Forty-eighth Congress. This is a subject of the highest national importance, and it will, no doubt, elicit intense partisan feeling, especially should the Republicans undertake, as it is hinted they may, to institute an inquiry whether, under section two of the Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment and section twenty-two of the Revised Statutes, the right to vote in some of the Southern States has not been abridged, and whether, in consequence, the number of Representatives from the Southern States ought not to be reduced, as the law provides shall be done in certain contingencies. Among the subjects which the outgoing Congress must consider is that of making provision for funding $675,000,000 of bonds, $300,000,000 of which are six per cents., and the remainder fives. The sixes are redeemable in June next and the fives on the 1st of May, so that action in the direction of funding cannot well be delayed. Another subject which the present Congress cannot well escape is that of putting a stop to the coinage of silver dollars, of which there are $80,000,000 now hoarded up in the Treasury vaults, apparently in excess of any existing demand.

OUR RAILWAY SYSTEM.

THE growth of the railroad system of the United States has been most extraordinary. It was in July, 1828, that ground was broken in Baltimore for the construction of the Baltimore and Ohio line, the first road ever chartered in this country. Two years later, in 1830, there were 23 miles of railroad in operation; in 1840, 2,818 miles; in 1850, 9,021 miles; in 1860, 30,635 miles; in 1870, 52,914 miles, and in 1879, 86,497 miles. From these figures it appears that not only has there been an addition to the railroad mileage in each decade, but that addition has been a constantly increasing one. The largest increase in mileage in any one year was in 1871, when there were 7,379 miles put into operation. The panic which then depressed every branch of trade and business in the country very seriously affected railroad enterprise. From 1871 there was a steady decline until 1875, in which year only 1,712 miles were constructed. Since that time there has been a strong reaction, and railroad building has been steadily improving, until last year there were 4,721 miles added to our railroad system.

During the present year the activity in railroad construction is greater than ever known, and before its close the record of 1871 will be surpassed. For the six months ended on the 30th of June last, more than 1,700 miles of track were laid, being twice as much as were constructed during the first half of 1879, and three times as much as in the corresponding period of any year since 1873. The statistics up to the present time are necessarily incomplete, but they are inaccurate only in showing results below the actual figures. The statistics at hand, from official sources, show that 4,275 miles have been constructed so far during the year, against 2,619 miles for the same time last year, 1,527 miles in 1878, 1,629 miles in 1877, 1,770 miles in 1876, 920 miles in 1875, 1,242 miles in 1874, 2,955 miles in 1873, and 5,312 miles in 1872. The incomplete record for less than ten months of the current year, therefore, shows an addition to the railway mileage nearly equal to that of the entire year of 1879.

But these statistics fail to show, except in a partial degree, the immense proportions which railroad enterprise has assumed. During the first six months of 1880, in addition to the 1,700 miles of track laid and fully completed, there were 8,000 miles in course of completion, with a fair prospect of being entirely finished before the close of the year. In these figures are included the track which has been laid since June 30th, and which appears in the statistics to date. Besides the mileage under construction on July 1st last, there were new enterprises originated between January and July, involving the construction of 10,850 miles of new track, upon none of which had work been begun prior to July 1st. Since that date a large portion of it has been put under contract, and armies of track-layers are busily employed completing the work. Leaving out of consideration the mileage that have been completed since that date, and the new projects that have since been undertaken, the mileage completed, in course of construction and projected during the first half of the year aggregates over 20,000 miles. While it is not to be expected that such an enormous amount of work will be done this year, such a feat is less improbable than would have been the completion of 500 miles fifty years ago. The total cost of the railroads and equipment in the United States at the close of last year amounted to more than $4,400,000,000, and it is a moderate estimate to put the cost of the additional railroads constructed during the present year at $500,000,000.

The greatness and extent of the railroad system of the United States appear more conspicuous only on a comparison between this country and those abroad. The United States, with an estimated population of less than 50,000,000 people, and an area of less than 4,000,000 square miles, has a railroad mileage equal to that of Great Britain and Ireland, France, Spain, Russia, Germany, Austria, Italy, British India, Canada and Mexico, with a combined population of 485,000,000 people and an area of about 15,000,000 square miles. The railway mileage of the United States almost equals that of all Europe, the difference at the end of this year probably not amounting to more than from 7,000 to 10,000 miles, with a possible large reduction even from these figures, the difference in favor of Europe on January 1st, 1879, being only 14,500 miles. The total mileage of the world at that time was 197,617 miles, and the United States then owned 45 per cent. of that total, so that by the end of 1880 about one half of the railroads of the world will be in American territory.

That the people of the United States are more adequately supplied with railroad facilities than any people in the world is shown by the following figures: In the United States there is one mile of railroad to every 550 persons on a moderate calculation, and one mile to every 40 square miles of area. In Great Britain the population is 1,850 people to each mile of railroad, and the area is 7 square miles; in Germany there are 2,370 people and 11 square miles; in France 2,620 people and 14 square miles; in Spain 4,000 people and 45 square miles; in Austria 5,100 people and 34 square miles; in Russia 6,600 people and 646 square miles, and in Canada, which is next to the United States as to proportion of population, 720 people and 636 square miles to each mile of railway. Mexico presents a sorry contrast—although there are several schemes afloat in Boston intended to redeem that country from its unfortunate condition—and furnishes only one mile of railroad to every 4,300 of its inhabitants and to each 2,000 square miles of its area. Truly the United States stands preëminent among nations as the greatest patron of the railroad, and its people are daily reaping the benefit of it in the shape of cheap rates and fares, the cheapest in the world; excellent accommodations, the best in the world, and the magnitude of commerce, soon no doubt to be the greatest in the world.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

AFFAIRS have at last come to a crisis in Ireland, and the Government, badgered upon one side by the agitators and reproached by the landlords on the other, have begun a prosecution. Mr. Parnell and thirteen other members of the Land League have been subpœnaed to appear before the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin. It is hoped by bringing the offenders into a higher court that it will be possible to get a jury to convict. The allegations in the indictment seem rather flimsy and scarcely particular enough; but it is sincerely to be hoped that something will be done to put an end to the present terrible state of anarchy. A great deal of excitement is raised by the case of a Mr. Boycott, a landlord in Mayo. The agitators desired the laborers on his estate not to work, and the crops had to be left standing in the field. Then his servants were told that they must leave their master, who is almost starved out. However, being a man of energy and determination, he cut as much of his crops as he could himself, while his wife tied up the sheaves. A few days ago he sallied into a neighboring town to procure provisions, but being recognized, the military had to be called out in order to rescue him. An Ulster man has engaged to take a number of laborers from the North of Ireland, gather Mr. Boycott's crops, and resist any attack that may be made, provided his expenses are paid. One of the Conservative newspapers has started a subscription, and six times the required amount has already been collected. Meantime, every one's attention is fixed upon Mr. Boycott's little farm, and its relief promises to become as famous as that of Lucknow. Whether there will be any breach of the peace depends upon the Land League, which does not seem to be in quite as thriving a condition as it was some time ago. It was generally believed that Mr. Parnell was about to retire from it, partly because of the petty jealousies among its members, and partly because of the very decided stand which has been taken by the priests against all the agitators since Archbishop McCabe's pastoral was issued. A Cabinet council will be held during the present week, at which it is expected a definite policy as to the whole Irish question will be agreed upon. Other important matters will also be considered.

It is understood that Prince Bismarck desires to see the enforcement of the will of Europe in the Turkish question deferred until Austria shall have been put into a condition to defend her newly acquired responsibilities and frontiers under the treaty of Berlin; but Earl Granville refuses to comply with the request, and some irritation is likely to result.

Dulcigno has not as yet been ceded. It is reported that the Albanians are arming and will resist all attempts to take their little port from them. The Porte has resolved to increase the Turkish force in Thessaly and Epirus to 42,000 men, and to construct ten batteries for the defense of the Dardanelles. Mr. Gladstone is said to be quite convinced of the possibility of forming a Balkan-Slavonic Federation, independent alike of Russia and Austria, and it is this belief that makes his policy so fanciful. For some years past Mme. Norikoff, a Russian lady of great ability, has acquired a good deal of influence over Mr. Gladstone. She is the wife of a Russian General and sister-in-law of a former Russian Ambassador at Constantinople. Being thoroughly imbued with the philo-Slavonic theories, she has sought every means to bring them before the English public both by writing in such magazines as Fraser's, and by impressing upon the minds of public men the advantages to be gained by a close alliance between England and Russia. It is scarcely probable that she will be successful, but her actions are attracting the attention of other nations, notably of Germany.

In France the expulsions of the unauthorized religious communities continue, and the Tribunal of Conflicts have decided against the Jesuits upon the question of disqualifying the Minister of Justice from presiding at its sittings. Throughout the provinces there has been much hard feeling against the Government for the harshness with which the decrees have been at times carried out. In many cases the prefects and other officers to whom the execution of the decrees was intrusted have resigned rather than be parties to what they consider an act of tyranny and bigoted persecution. The intolerance of opposition which the Government shows from time to time also makes itself felt by the constant prosecution of newspapers. Several editors have been fined and imprisoned for publishing obscene articles, and in some cases the authors have also been punished. Felix Pyat's newspaper, the Commune, is now being prosecuted for an article insulting to the army, and the famous Jung affair is still before the public. Jung's wife, the Baronne Kaulla, as she is called, writes to the Figaro that she intends to take an action for slander against her husband if he will consent. According to French law, a wife cannot bring an action without the consent of her husband, so that the baronne cannot do anything unless she obtains his concurrence. Whether Colonel Jung will be sufficiently amiable to oblige his wife or not is not settled, but so far he does not see the advantage of being sued.

The Comédie Française has just celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of its foundation by a series of performances of Molière's plays. "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which was played upon the first and last days of the fête, was especially successful. Lully's music was given with it, and the minuets were danced in the style of that day. The house was magnificently decorated, and all the best people in Paris were present. Foreign ambassadors went wearing their orders. Ushers with silver chains, knee-breeches and black silk stockings received the guests, and Gambetta, Grévy, Victor Hugo, and a host of celebrities filled the boxes and stalls. The taste for Molière's comedies has been so increased by this celebration that M. Perrin, the manager of the Théâtre Français, has announced his intention of giving a series of classical reproductions.

THE tide of immigration shows no signs of abatement. During the month of October the arrivals at this port numbered 30,697, of whom 4,000 came in on a single day. The total number of immigrants landed at Castle Garden during the year, up to the 1st instant, is stated at 285,327, against 112,272 for the corresponding period of last year.

THE spectre of Nihilism still confronts and alarms the Russian Government. It is stated that 150 Nihilist prisoners—many of them persons of high station—will soon be placed on trial at St. Petersburg and elsewhere for crimes against the national authority; and there seems to be no doubt that the reactionary agitation is just as intense as at any time in the past, though, perhaps, less ostentatious in its manifestations. The severity of the Government has not in the least abated the feeling of popular discontent.

THE reduction in the public debt for the four months of the present fiscal year ending on the 1st instant amounted to $33,681,867, being over $23,000,000 greater than for the corresponding four months of last year. The receipts from internal revenue during October amounted to $11,737,000, and for the four months to $44,297,000. The gain in both customs and internal revenue receipts in favor of the four months of 1880 is $15,626,000, which is due, of course, to the general revival of business activity throughout the country.

THE defeat of Representative Atkins in the Eighth Tennessee District involves the loss of a most capable and valuable public servant in the House of Representatives. Mr. Atkins has been conspicuous as the uncompromising opponent of extravagance in expenditure and redundancy in legislation, and his influence, not only in his own party, but in the House as a whole, has always been most salutary. Another member who will be missed from the next House is Hon. S. B. Chittenden, of Brooklyn, whose vigorous support of sound financial measures has entitled him to the thanks of all who believe that our system of finance should be based on principles of honesty and justice.

THE New York Sun advises the Democrats to divert their minds by the study of astronomy. Thus:

"Have you noticed the wonderful brilliancy and beauty of Jupiter?

"To the naked eye, and without the aid of a telescope, it looks like a torch in the sky.

"The reason Jupiter has shone with such remarkable brilliancy of late is because it has been nearing the point when it appears largest to observers on our planet—a point which it will not reach again until about twenty years hence, which will be quite as soon as the Democratic Party can reasonably expect to attain to power under its present leadership.

"The most sublime of all studies is astronomy. It turns the thoughts of mortals from terrestrial troubles heavenward.

"Democrats, study astronomy!

"Jupiter and the other planets—except this earth of ours—are just about as bright as they were before election."

A CHICAGO paper tells the story of a corner in pork just closed up which seems to have been the most gigantic and successful deal of that particular kind ever attempted or carried out. In July of last year a Chicago firm, after a careful study of the home and foreign market, began the purchase of pork in great quantities, and in December closed out, making a profit of $2,000,000. Not satisfied that it had reached the highest point, they continued buying until pork had dropped from $14 to $9.25, absorbing their profit and an additional million. In April of this year they again began buying at $10 a barrel, and bought up 350,000 barrels of spot pork and 1,250,000 barrels of options. For the last three months they have been closing out their gigantic purchases at prices ranging from $16 to $18.50, clearing over $7,000,000 on this deal, and being winners on the two deals to the extent of $6,000,000.

THE leading Democratic journals of the South are speaking out with unmistakable emphasis as to the causes of the late party defeat. Thus the Louisville Courier-Journal says of the management of the Democratic canvass that "It failed to give out from first to last one breezy, soul-stirring note." After indicating some of the principal blunders of the campaign, the Journal adds: "Different, indeed, would it have been had the Democratic leaders planted themselves in the principles of justice and truth; had they gathered about the old ticket with the enthusiasm of deep conviction; had they hoisted signals to which all true Americans could rally, and, instead of going into action on half-truths, and divided even as to them, submitted to the people, as above all minor issues, the vindication of their elective system in the redress of a great wrong. Undoubtedly General Hancock made as popular a candidate as could have been named. If a rose-water campaign was wanted, he was the man for it. But he represented nothing which the country held nearer to its heart than easy times and freedom from political cares. He did not touch the depths of the popular nature. He simply skated over its surface. Personally, he is unhurt. He is the same gallant, attractive figure he was before. He is responsible for none of the errors or shortcomings. He was sacrificed to the madness of a few short-sighted politicians, many of whom have gone down with him in the vortex of this defeat. But, in the history of his time, he will stand out as one who loved his country and served it brilliantly; who, less fortunate in politics than in arms, yet was true to the principles of free government when luckier men were faithless." The Journal tells a good deal of plain truth in this ringing summary of causes and results.

THE reconstruction of the Supreme Court of the United States seems to be one of the inevitable necessities of the near future. Two of the present judges are incapacitated by illness for active service, and two others are so advanced in years that they are entitled to retire with honor and life salaries. Probably successors to all these judges will be appointed by the President-elect, and it cannot be doubted that such a result is desirable if the vigor and usefulness of the Court are to be properly maintained. In point of fact, there seems to be good reason for an enlargement of the Court, which is now three years behind with its calendar, with but a slim prospect of ever "catching up" with its business. There are now but two more judges than there were in 1837. Since then our population has almost trebled, while the number of States have increased from twenty-five to thirty-eight, and the amount of litigation, as well as the importance and gravity of the cases, carried before the Court have also vastly increased. Obviously something should be done to remedy the evil at the present session, and we may expect that, in addition to the change of the personnel of the Court, some legislation will soon be had looking to the more adequate performance of its very important functions.

CORRESPONDENCE from England represents that the condition of agricultural holdings there is at present attracting much serious consideration. In most counties, many large farms have been surrendered and thousands of acres thrown on the hands of the proprietors. Farmers say they cannot make the land pay under the present rentals. The remedy is obvious—a revaluation. Indeed, this is being loudly called for, and no doubt will occupy the early attention of Parliament. Many causes conspire to produce the present condition of affairs. The chief one is that rentals are on the old basis of valuation, when protection existed. Matters have of late years undergone a radical change. The free importation of grain, where supplies are in proportion to demand, and the telegraph informs the shipper of the requirements of the market, has thrown on the English grower a competition which can only be sustained by high-class farming, great economy in detail, and bringing the land to the best possible state of cultivation. Even then he cannot sell on equal terms with the importer, so that to pay the old rental is impossible. In truth, this is practically admitted by the voluntary reduction, in many instances, of twenty-five per cent. of the rental, notwithstanding which surrenders still go on.

ONE of the first acts of the incoming Administration should be the negotiation of a new treaty with Germany under which the rights of Americans shall be secure against the doctrine of "once a citizen always a citizen." Not a year passes that complaints are not made to the American Embassy at Berlin by adopted citizens who, having returned to their native land, have been threatened with expulsion from the country or enforced enlistment in the German army. Germany has just now set up the claim that Alsace and Lorraine are not included in the operation of the present treaty with the old North German Confederation, having been acquired since its negotiation, thus leaving us without an extradition treaty so far as those provinces are concerned, and placing our adopted American citizens, who were born there, in the position of a German citizen if he returns home and is found in his province. One of our citizens now lies in a German prison, wrongfully confined, and, as the case now stands, our Government is powerless to act. In justice to the men who have contributed so largely to make this country what it is, we should negotiate a treaty which will prevent the possibility of such occurrences in the future, or else demand satisfaction from the German Government for all acts so insulting to our sovereignty as a nation.

UNDOUBTEDLY business conditions had a good deal to do with the result of the recent election. Business men were unwilling to incur the risks of a "change" which offered no positive advantages but great possible harm, and they largely cast their influence into the Republican scale. If that party shall prove equal to its opportunities, it will establish a fresh claim upon the public confidence; if it shall falter and evade living issues, it will be sent to the rear. The New York Times, commenting on the party opportunities, appropriately says:

"Probably before the expiration of General Garfield's term changes in the business of the country will force some action in regard to the currency. The Republican Party has been sustained by that large class of business men who foresee this necessity, and who have believed that when the time for action arrived the party would move in the direction of improving, and not of debasing, the currency. This fact will have to be borne in mind by the Administration. Our tax laws will also have to be revised. Taxation is heavier than it need be. It is in many regards unequal and oppressive. Industries of importance are discriminated against in favor of others no more entitled to consideration. These wrongs must be righted. They cannot be concealed under the general plea of protection to American labor, because they are injurious to American labor. It will be fortunate for the Republican Party if its leaders show the courage and sagacity necessary to deal with the subject, because, in spite of the apparent strength contributed to the party by the recent professions of protectionist ideas, the people will eventually perceive the difference between real and false protection."

THE NATIONAL ELECTION.

MAJORITIES FOR GARFIELD AND ARTHUR.

THE result of the Presidential election on the 2d instant was even more favorable to the Republicans than was generally anticipated by cool and unprejudiced observers. The vote in the country at large was enormous, being especially heavy in the populous States of the North where large manufacturing interests are concentrated. The following table exhibits the result in the Electoral College:

Garfield.	Votes.	Hancock.	Votes.
California	6	Alabama	10
Colorado	3	Arkansas	6
Connecticut	6	Delaware	3
Illinois	21	Florida	4
Indiana	15	Georgia	11
Iowa	11	Kentucky	12
Kansas	5	Louisiana	8
Maine	7	Maryland	8
Massachusetts	13	Mississippi	8
Michigan	11	Missouri	15
Minnesota	5	Nevada	3
Nebraska	3	New Jersey	9
New Hampshire	5	North Carolina	10
New York	35	South Carolina	7
Ohio	22	Tennessee	12
Oregon	3	Texas	8
Pennsylvania	29	Virginia	11
Rhode Island	4	West Virginia	5
Vermont	5
Wisconsin	10	Total	150
Total	219

The popular majorities are shown in the following statement:

Republican.		Democratic.
California	500	Alabama	40,000
Colorado	3,000	Arkansas	30,000
Connecticut	2,500	Delaware	800
Illinois	47,000	Florida	4,000
Indiana	8,500	Georgia	40,000
Iowa	83,000	Kentucky	50,000
Kansas	50,000	Louisiana	10,000
Maine	4,000	Maryland	18,000

Vermont	27,000
Wisconsin	30,000	Total	473,100
Total	494,100

New York, with its thirty-five votes given to the Republicans, is the pivotal State of the Union. In New York City and County, complete returns of the vote cast show that it only falls about 9,000 short of the registration, or 208,000 out of a registration of 216,941. Complete returns show that Hancock received 123,302 against 81,726 for Garfield. The city Republican vote for President shows an increase of 43 per cent. over their vote in 1876. The Democratic increase is only 8 per cent.

William R. Grace has been elected Mayor by a slim majority of 2,904.

General Garfield spent election day very quietly at his home, being apparently undisturbed by the excitement of the occasion. He visited the polls at Mentor and cast his ballot like any ordinary citizen. In the evening his office assumed a busy appearance. Two operators were engaged in receiving dispatches, while the General, Major D. G. Swaim (his confidential secretary) and a number of friends and neighbors, commented on the news, which was read by the candidate himself. One of the first dispatches was from fifty towns in Maine, showing large Republican gains over the vote in September. General Garfield received this news with evident satisfaction. An early bulletin was to the effect that New York City would give 56,000 Democratic majority. This was followed almost immediately by a second one putting the figure at 48,000. Several further favorable dispatches from Maine, Connecticut and New York came in quick succession, which seemed almost too good to be true, and caused General Garfield to remark, between whiffs of his cigar:

"Gentlemen, these figures are too favorable at this stage of the game. Let us wait for something later."

Another dispatch from Maine assured the State by 5,000 Republican majority, which provoked applause from those present, but the man most concerned gave no sign of especial interest, and went on reading the bulletins as they came in.

Presently came an authentic dispatch from New York, saying that from the returns already in the Republican gain in the city would be 24,000. General Garfield coolly wrote out a dispatch to be sent to Warren, embodying the latest news, and then arose and cordially greeted several neighbors who had just come in. The following was read about 9 o'clock:

"J. A. GARFIELD—Maine has given you a handsome majority over all the opposing tickets. Will send details later.

"JAMES G. BLAINE."

"It's a little queer we don't hear from Indiana," remarked the General; "but the returns in October were the last to come in," and he proceeded to figure up gains just in from Massachusetts, munching an apple meanwhile.

About this time the following telegram came, dated at New York:

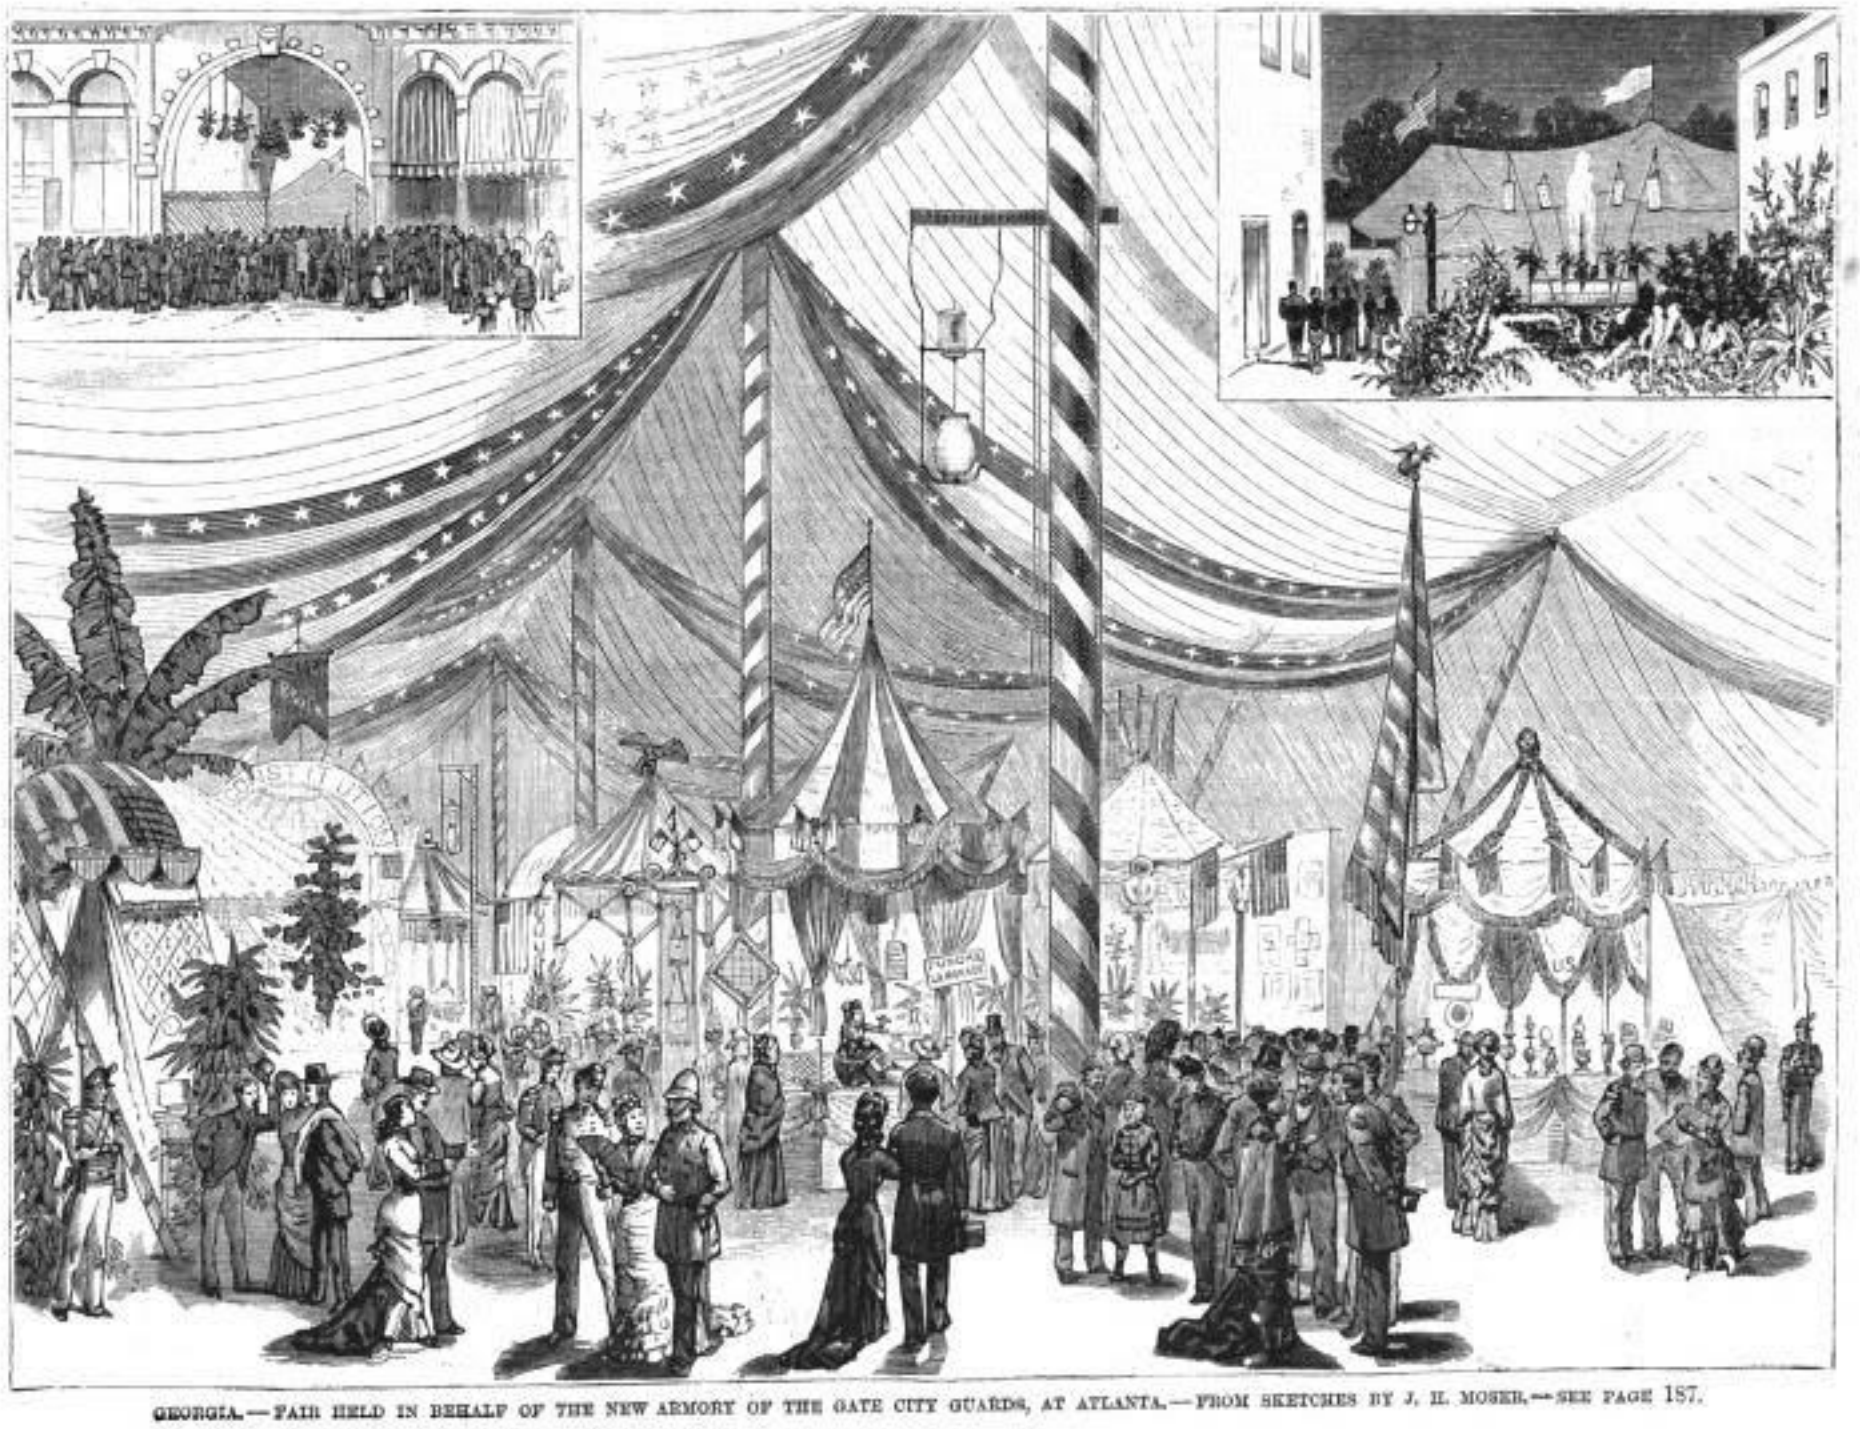
"GENERAL J. A. GARFIELD—This city gives about 45,000 majority for Hancock. Indications of a majority for you of 40,000 in State. News from Maine and Jersey good.

"G. W. DORSEY."

Shortly after 9 o'clock the full returns from Mentor were brought in, giving a Republican gain of 13 over October, and General Garfield congratulated his neighbors on their good work. After reading another bulletin from the Empire State, General Garfield expressed his opinion for the first time. Said he:

"Gentlemen, if we have got New York, as the indications are that we have, we can give them the entire Pacific Coast, New Jersey and Connecticut and the 'Solid South,' and then beat them." Even as he said this there was no particular excitement in his manner. He was, as one of his neighbors said, "The coolest man in Ohio to-night." The appended message was hailed with cheers:

"JAMES A. GARFIELD—The Republicans of New York City, assembled in mass meeting at Chickering Hall, send their most hearty congratulations to the President elect, and assure him of a handsome majority in the State of over 40,000. Down goes 329."



From this time on the President-elect felt more free to express himself. He said, after one of the most favorable dispatches:

"Gentlemen—This result means three things: First, that the American people believe in the nationality of the Government; second, that they believe in a good, honest, healthy financial policy; third, they are determined not to narrow and disgrace the sphere of American politics by indorsing a campaign of personal abuse."

On the day after the election 700 of the faculty and students of Oberlin College visited Mentor, it being the first deputation to congratulate General Garfield, who said to them, in reply to an address from the president of the Institution:

"MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: This spontaneous visit is so much more agreeable than a prepared one. It comes more directly from the heart of the people who participate, and I receive it as a greater compliment for that reason. I do not wish to be unduly impressible or superstitious, but, though we have outlived the days of the augurs, I think we have a right to think of some events as omens, and I greet this as a happy and auspicious omen, that the first general greeting since the event of yesterday is tendered to me by a venerable institution of learning. The thought has been abroad in the world a good deal, and with reason, that there is a divorce between scholarship and politics. Oberlin, I believe, has never advocated that divorce; but there has been a sort of cloistered scholarship in the United States that has stood aloof from active participation in public affairs, and I am glad to be greeted here to-day by the active, live scholarship of Ohio, and I know of no place where scholarship has touched upon the nerve-centre of public intelligence so effectually as at Oberlin. For this reason I am specially grateful for this greeting from the faculty and students of Oberlin College and its venerable president. I thank you, ladies and gentlemen, for this visit. Whatever the significance of yesterday's event may be, it will be all the more significant for being immediately indorsed by the scholarship and culture of my State. I thank you, ladies and gentlemen, and I thank your president for coming with you. You are cordially welcome."

THE BLACK ROBE.

CHAPTER VI.—THE ORDER OF THE DISHES.

WHEN Miss Notman assumed the post of housekeeper in Lady Loring's service, she was accurately described as "a competent and respectable person"; and was praised, with perfect truth, for her incorruptible devotion to the interests of her employers. On its weaker side, her character was represented by the wearing of a youthful wig, and the erroneous conviction that she still possessed a fine figure. The ruling idea in her narrow little mind was the idea of her own dignity. Any offense offered in this direction oppressed her memory for days together, and found its way outwards in speech to any human being whose attention she could secure.

At five o'clock on the day which followed his introduction to Romayne, Father Benwell sat drinking his coffee in the housekeeper's room—to all appearance as much at his ease as if he had known Miss Notman from the remote days of her childhood. A new contribution to the housekeeper's little library of devotional works lay on the table, and bore silent witness to the means by which he had made those first advances which had won him his present position. Miss Notman's sense of dignity was doubly flattered. She had a priest for a guest, and a new book with the reverend gentleman's autograph inscribed on the title-page.

"Is your coffee to your liking, Father?"

"A little more sugar, if you please."

Miss Notman was proud of her hand, viewed as one of the meritorious details of her figure. She took up the sugar-tongs with suavity and grace; she dropped the sugar into the cup, with a youthful pleasure in ministering to the minor desires of her illustrious guest.

"It is so good of you, Father, to honor me in this way," she said, with the appearance of sixteen superinduced upon the reality of sixty.

Father Benwell was an adept at moral disguises of all kinds. On this occasion, he wore the disguise of pastoral simplicity.

"I am an idle old man at this hour of the afternoon," he said. "I hope I am not keeping you from any household duties?"

"I generally enjoy my duties," Miss Notman answered. "To-day they have not been so agreeable as usual; it is a relief to me to have done with them. Even my humble position has its trials."

Persons acquainted with Miss Notman's character, hearing these words, would have at once changed the subject. When she spoke of "her humble position," she invariably referred to some offense offered to her dignity, and she was invariably ready to state the grievance at full length. Ignorant of this peculiarity, Father Benwell committed a fatal error. He inquired, with courteous interest, what the housekeeper's "trials" might be.

"Oh, sir, they are beneath your notice!" said Miss Notman, modestly. "At the same time, I should feel it an honor to have the benefit of your opinion—I should so like to know that you did not altogether disapprove of my conduct, under some provocation. You see, Father, the whole responsibility of ordering the dinners falls on me. And, when there is company, as there is this evening, the responsibility is particularly trying to a timid person like myself."

"A large dinner-party, Miss Notman?"

"Oh, dear, no! Quite the reverse. Only one gentleman—Mr. Romayne."

Father Benwell set down his cup of coffee, half way to his lips. He at once drew the correct conclusion that the invitation to Romayne must have been given and accepted after he had left the picture-gallery. That the object was to bring Romayne and Stella together, under circumstances which would rapidly improve their acquaintance, was as plain to him as if he had heard it confessed in so many words. If he had only remained in the gallery, he might have become acquainted with the form of persuasion used to induce a man so unsocial as Romayne to accept an invitation. "I have myself to blame," he thought, bitterly, "for being left in the dark."

"Anything wrong with the coffee?" Miss Notman asked, anxiously.

He rushed on to his fate. He said, "Nothing whatever. Pray go on."

Miss Notman went on.

"You see, Father, Lady Loring was unusually particular about the dinner on this occasion. She said, 'Lord Loring reminds me that Mr. Romayne is a very little eater, and yet very difficult to please in what he does eat.' Of course, I consulted my experience, and suggested exactly the sort of dinner that was wanted under the circumstances. I wish to do her ladyship the utmost justice. She made no objection to the dinner in itself. On the contrary, she complimented me on what she was pleased to call my ready invention. But when we came next to the order in which the dishes were to be served——" Miss Notman paused in the middle of the sentence and shuddered over the private and poignant recollections which the order of the dishes called up.

By this time Father Benwell had discovered his mistake. He took a mean advantage of Miss Nortman's susceptibilities to slip his own private inquiries into the interval of silence.

"Pardon my ignorance," he said; "my own poor dinner is a matter of ten minutes, and one dish. I don't understand a difference of opinion on a dinner for three people only. Lord and Lady Loring, two; Mr. Romayne, three—oh! perhaps I am mistaken! Perhaps Miss Eyrecourt makes a fourth!"

"Certainly, Father!"

"A very charming person, Miss Notman. I only speak as a stranger. You, no doubt, are much better acquainted with Miss Eyrecourt!"

"Much better, indeed, if I may presume to say so." Miss Notman replied. "She is my lady's intimate friend; we have often talked of Miss Eyrecourt, during the many years of my residence in this house. On such subjects her ladyship treats me quite on the footing of an humble friend. A complete contrast to the tone she took, Father, when we came to the order of the dishes. We agreed, of course, about the soup and the fish, but we had a little, a very little, divergence of opinion, as I may call it, on the subject of the dishes to follow. Her ladyship said, 'First the sweetbreads and then the cutlets.' I ventured to suggest that the sweetbreads, as white meat, had better not immediately follow the turbot, as white fish. 'The brown meat, my lady,' I said, 'as an agreeable variety presented to the eye, and then the white meat, recalling pleasant remembrances of the white fish.' You see the point, Father?"

"I see, Miss Notman, that you are a consummate mistress of an art which is quite beyond poor me. Was Miss Eyrecourt present at the little discussion?"

"Oh, no! Indeed I should have objected to her presence; I should have said she was a young lady out of her proper place."

"Yes, yes; I understand. Is Miss Eyrecourt an only child?"

"An only child now. She had a sister, who is dead.

"Sad for the father and mother, Miss Notman?"

"Pardon me, sad for the mother, no doubt. The father died long since."

"Ay! ay! A sweet woman, the mother? At least, I think I have heard so."

Miss Notman shook her head. "I should wish to guard myself against speaking unjustly of any one," she said; "but when you talk of a 'sweet woman,' you apply (as it seems to me) the domestic virtues. Mrs. Eyrecourt is essentially a frivolous person."

A frivolous person is, in the vast majority of cases, a person easily persuaded to talk, and not disposed to be reticent in keeping secrets. Father Benwell began to see his way already to the necessary information.

"Is Mrs. Eyrecourt living in London?" he inquired.

"Oh, dear, no! At this time of year she lives entirely in other people's houses—goes from one country-seat to another, and only thinks of amusing herself. No domestic qualities, Father. She would know nothing of the order of the dishes! Lady Loring, I should have told you, gave way in the matter of the sweetbread. It was only at quite the latter part of my 'menoo,' as the French call it, that she showed a spirit of opposition—well, well! I won't dwell on that. I will only ask you, Father, at what part of a dinner an oyster-omelette ought to be served?"

Father Benwell seized his opportunity of discovering Mrs. Eyrecourt's present address. "My dear lady," he said, "I know no more when the omelette ought to be served than Mrs. Eyrecourt herself! It must be very pleasant to a lady of her way of thinking to enjoy the beauties of nature inexpensively—as seen in other people's houses, from the point of view of a welcome guest. I wonder whether she is staying at any country-seat which I happen to have seen?"

"She may be in England, Scotland or Ireland, for all I know," Miss Notman answered, with an unaffected ignorance which placed her good faith beyond doubt. "Consult your own taste, Father. After eating jelly, cream and ice-pudding, could you even look at an oyster-omelette without shuddering? Would you believe it? Her ladyship proposed to serve the omelette with the cheese. Oysters, after sweets! I am not (as yet) a married woman——"

Father Benwell made a last desperate effort to pave the way for one more question before he submitted to defeat. "That must be your fault, my dear lady!" he interposed, with his persuasive smile.

Miss Notman simpered. "You confuse me, Father," she said, softly.

"I speak from inward conviction, Miss Notman. To a looker-on, like myself, it is sad to see how many sweet women, who might be angels in the households of worthy men, prefer to lead a single life. The Church, I know, exalts the single life to the highest place. But even the Church allows exceptions to its rule. Under this roof, for example, I think I see two exceptions. One of them my unfeigned respect" (he bowed to Miss Notman) "forbids me to indicate more particularly. The other seems, to my humble view, to be the young lady of whom we have been speaking. Is it not strange that Miss Eyrecourt has never been married?"

The trap had been elaborately set; Father Benwell had every reason to anticipate that Miss Notman would walk into it. The disconcerting housekeeper walked up to it—and then proved unable to advance a step further.

"I once made the same remark myself to Lady Loring," she said.

Father Benwell's pulse began to quicken its beat. "Yes?" he murmured, in tones of the gentlest encouragement.

"And her ladyship," Miss Notman proceeded, "did not encourage me to go on. 'There are reasons for not pursuing that subject,' she said, 'reasons into which I am sure you will not expect me to enter.' She spoke with a flattering confidence in my prudence which I felt gratefully. Such a contrast to her tone when the omelette presented itself in the order of the dishes! As I said just now, I am not a married woman. But it I proposed to my husband to give him an oyster-omelette after his puddings and his pies, I should not be surprised if he said to me, 'My dear, have you taken leave of your senses?' I reminded Lady Loring most respectfully that a cheese-omelette might be in its proper place if it followed the sweets. 'An oyster-omelette,' I suggested, 'surely comes after the birds?' I should be sorry to say that her ladyship lost her temper—I will only mention that I kept mine. Let me repeat what she said, and leave you, Father, to draw your own conclusions. She said, 'Which of us is mistress in this house, Miss Notman? I order the oyster-omelette to come in with the cheese.' There was not only irritability, there was contempt—oh, yes! contempt—in her tone. Out of respect for myself, I made no reply. As a Christian, I can forgive; as a wounded gentlewoman, I may not find it so easy to forget."

Miss Notman laid herself back in her easy-chair—she looked as if she had suffered martyrdom, and only regretted having been obliged to mention it. Father Benwell surprised the wounded gentlewoman by rising to his feet.

"You are not going away already, Father?"

"Time flies fast in your society, dear Miss Notman. I have an engagement—and I am late for it already."

The housekeeper smiled sadly. "At least let me hear that you don't disapprove of my conduct under trying circumstances," she said.

Father Benwell took her hand.

"A true Christian only feels offenses to pardon them," he remarked, in his priestly and paternal character. "You have shown me, Miss Notman, that you are a true Christian. My evening has indeed been well spent. God bless you!"

He pressed her hand; he shed on her the light of his fatherly smile; he sighed and took his leave. Miss Notman's eyes followed him out with devotional admiration.

Father Benwell still preserved his serenity of temper when he was out of the housekeeper's sight. One important discovery he had made, in spite of the difficulties placed in his way. A compromising circumstance had unquestionably occurred in Stella's past life; and a man was, beyond all doubt, in some way connected with it. "My evening has not been entirely thrown away," he thought, as he ascended the stairs which led from the housekeeper's room to the hall.

CHAPTER VII.—THE INFLUENCE OF STELLA.

ENTERING the hall, Father Benwell heard a knock at the house-door. The servants appeared to recognize the knock—the porter admitted Lord Loring.

Father Benwell advanced and made his bow. It was a perfect obeisance of its kind—respect for Lord Loring, unobtrusively accompanied by respect for himself.

"Has your lordship been walking in the park?" he inquired.

"I have been out on business," Lord Loring answered, "and I should like to tell you about it. If you can spare me a few minutes, come into the library. Some time since," he resumed, when the door was closed, "I think I mentioned that my friends had been speaking to me on a subject of some importance—the subject of opening my picture-gallery occasionally to the public."

"I remember," said Father Benwell. "Has your lordship decided what to do?"

"Yes. I have decided (as the phrase is) to 'go with the times,' and follow the example of other owners of picture-galleries. Don't suppose I ever doubted that it is my duty to extend, to the best of my ability, the civilizing influences of art. My only hesitation in the matter arose from a dread of some accident happening, or some injury being done to the pictures. Even now, I can only persuade myself to try the experiment under certain restrictions."

"A wise decision undoubtedly," said Father Benwell. "In such a city as this, you could scarcely open your gallery to everybody who happens to pass the house-door."

"I am glad you agree with me, Father. The gallery will be opened for the first time on Monday. Any respectably-dressed person presenting a visiting card at the offices of the librarians in Bond Street and Regent Street, will receive a free ticket of admission, the number of the tickets, it is needless to say, being limited, and the gallery being only opened to the public two days in the week. You will be here, I suppose, on Monday?"

"Certainly. My work in the library, as your lordship can see, has only begun."

"I am very anxious about the success of this experiment," said Lord Loring. "Do look in at the gallery, once or twice in the course of the day, and tell me what your own impression is."

Having expressed his readiness to assist "the experiment" in every possible way, Father Benwell still lingered in the library. He was secretly conscious of a hope that he might, at the eleventh hour, be invited to join Romayne at the dinner table. Lord Loring only looked at the clock on the mantelpiece; it was nearly time to dress for dinner. The priest had no alternative but to take the hint, and leave the house.

Five minutes after he had withdrawn, a messenger delivered a letter for Lord Loring, in which Father Benwell's interests were directly involved. The letter was from Romayne. It contained his excuses for breaking his engagement, literally at an hour's notice.

"Only yesterday," he wrote, "I had a return of what you, my dear friend, call 'the delusion of the voice.' The nearer the hour of your dinner approaches, the more I feel the dread that the same thing may happen in your house. Pity me and forgive me."

Even good-natured Lord Loring felt some difficulty in pitying and forgiving when he read these lines. "This sort of caprice might be excusable in a woman," he thought. "A man ought really to be capable of exercising some self-control. Poor Stella! And what will my wife say?"

He walked up and down the library, with Stella's disappointment and Lady Loring's indignation prophetically present in his mind. There was, however, no help for it—he must accept his responsibility, and be the bearer of the bad news.

He was on the point of leaving the library, when a visitor appeared. The visitor was no less a person than Romayne himself.

"Have I arrived before my letter?" he asked, eagerly.

Lord Loring showed him the letter.

"Throw it into the fire," he said; "and let me try to excuse myself for having written it. You remember the happier days when you used to call me the creature of impulse? An impulse produced that letter. Another impulse brings me here to disown it. I can only explain my strange conduct by asking you to help me at the outset. Will you carry your memory back to the day when the physicians consulted on my case? I want you to correct me if I inadvertently misrepresent their opinions. Two of them were physicians. The third and last was a surgeon, a personal friend of yours; and he, as well as I recollect, told you how the consultation ended?"

"Quite right, Romayne—so far."

"The first of the two physicians," Romayne proceeded, "declared my case to be entirely attributable to nervous derangement, and to be curable by purely medical means. He proposed, first of all, to restore 'the tone of my stomach,' and, this done, to administer certain medicines, having a direct influence on the brain and the nervous system. I speak ignorantly, but, in plain English, that, I believe, was the substance of what he said."

"The substance of what he said," Lord Loring replied, "and the substance of his prescriptions—which, I think, you afterwards tore up?"

"If you have no faith in a prescription," said Romayne, "that is, in my opinion, the best use to which you can put it. When it came to the turn of the second physician, he differed with the first as absolutely as one man can differ with another. The third medical authority, your friend the surgeon, took a medical course, and brought the consultation to an end by combining the first physician's view and the second physician's view, and mingling the two opposite forms of treatment in one harmonious result?"

Lord Loring remarked that this was not a very respectful way of describing the conclusion of the medical proceedings. That it was the conclusion, however, he could not honestly deny.

"As long as I am right," said Romayne, "nothing else appears to be of much importance. As I told you at the time, the second physician appeared to me to be the only one of the three authorities who really understood my case. Do you mind giving me, in a few words, your own impression of what he said?"

"Are you sure that I shall not distress you?"

"On the contrary, you may help me to hope."

"As I remember it," said Lord Loring, "the doctor did not deny the influence of the body over the mind. He was quite willing to admit that the state of your nervous system might be one among other predisposing causes which led you—I really scarcely like to go on."

"Which led me," Romayne continued, finishing the sentence for his friend, "to feel that I never shall forgive myself—accident or no accident—for having taken that man's life. Now go on."

"The delusion that you still hear the voice," Lord Loring proceeded, "is, in the doctor's opinion, the moral result of the morbid state of your mind at the time when you really heard the voice on the scene of the duel. The influence acts physically, of course, by means of certain nerves. But it is essentially a moral influence; and its power over you is greatly maintained by the self-accusing view of the circumstances which you persist in taking. That, in substance, is my recollection of what the doctor said."

"And when he was asked what remedies he proposed to try," Romayne inquired, "do you remember his answer? 'The mischief which moral influences have caused, moral influences alone can remedy.'"

"I remember," said Lord Loring. "And he mentioned, as examples of what he meant, the occurrence of some new and absorbing interest in your life, or the working of some complete change in your habits of thought—or perhaps some influence exercised over you by a person previously unknown, appearing under unforseen circumstances, or in scenes quite new to you."

Romayne's eyes sparkled.

"Now you are coming to it!" he cried. "Now I feel sure that I recall correctly the last words the doctor said: 'If Mr. Romayne follows my advice, I should not be surprised to hear that the recovery which we all wish to see, had found its beginning in such apparently trifling circumstances as the tone of some other person's voice, or the influence of some other person's look.' That plain expression of his opinion only occurred to my memory after I had written my foolish letter of excuse. I spare you the course of other recollections that followed to come at once to the result. For the first time I have the hope, the faint hope, that the voice which haunts me has been once already controlled by one of the influences of which the doctor spoke—the influence of a look."

If he had said this to Lady Loring, instead of to her husband, she would have understood him at once. Lord Loring asked for a word more of explanation.

"I told you yesterday," Romayne answered, "that a dread of the return of the voice had been present to me all the morning, and that I had come to see the picture with an idea of trying if change would relieve me. While I was in the gallery, I was free from the dread and free from the voice. When I returned to the hotel, it tortured me—and Mr. Penrose, I grieve to say, saw that I suffered. You and I attributed the remission to the change of scene. I now believe we were both wrong. Where was the change? In seeing you and Lady Loring, I saw the two oldest friends I have. In visiting your gallery, I only revived the familiar associations of hundreds of other visits. To what influence was I really indebted for my respite? Don't try to dismiss the question by laughing at my morbid fancies. Morbid fancies are realities to a man like me. Remember the doctor's words, Loring. Think of a new face, seen in your house! Think of a look that searched my heart for the first time!"

Lord Loring glanced once more at the clock on the mantelpiece. The hands pointed to the dinner-hour.

"Miss Eyrecourt!" he whispered.

"Yes—Miss Eyrecourt."

The library door was thrown open by a servant. Stella herself entered the room.

ANTI-CHINESE RIOT IN DENVER, COLORADO.

THE City of Denver has recently been disgraced by a temporary reign of mob-law quite as indefensible and violent as that which has occasionally prevailed in San Francisco during the anti-Chinese agitation. The origin of the brutal proceedings of the mob seems to have been in the antipathies to the Chinese roused by partisan publications, that in the event of the success of General Garfield the State would be flooded with Chinese, and all white labor driven out. On Saturday night, October 30th, a political procession carried transparencies through the streets with inscriptions and cartoons tending to excite animosity against the Chinese. A considerable portion of the rougher element became intoxicated, and on Sunday made an assault on Chinese houses, tearing down some twenty-three of them, destroying the contents and beating and driving out the occupants. One Chinaman was hung over his front door, and several badly beaten and wounded with stones and other missiles. For a time, during the evening, the mob had uncontrolled possession of the city, marching from street to street, and carrying consternation everywhere. The Fire Department was ordered to throw water on the rioters, but the mob mastered the firemen, and badly wounded two of them. A special police force was finally sworn in, and at the end of ten or twelve hours comparative quiet was restored. Many Chinamen escaped the brutalities of the mobs by being rescued from the back-doors of their dwellings while the assailants were demolishing the front-doors. At one time a squad of miscreants raised a disturbance near the post-office, but within ten minutes it was estimated that a thousand citizens, nearly all armed, were on the ground, and all the rioters at that point were arrested and sent to jail. A number of fires were also started, but no serious damage was done.

The Chinese population of Denver does not exceed 150 in all, and the assault upon them was in every respect unjustifiable. Good citizens condemned the outrage. A large number of arrests of persons concerned in the riot have been effected, and an effort will be made to vindicate the law which they so causelessly violated.

A MILITARY FAIR AT ATLANTA, GA.

THE fair of the Gate City Guards, of Atlanta, Ga., held in that city during the week commencing October 17th, was a very great success. It was held in a spacious tent, which was nightly crowded with visitors, who contributed largely by their patronage to the fund of the Guards, designed for the erection of their Memorial Armory. One of the most attractive features of the fair was the Flower Booth, over which a number of Atlanta's fairest daughters presided. During the fair there was a brilliant service of the laying of the corner-stone of the armory for the Guards, the Memorial Hymn being sung by a large chorus. Our illustration furnishes a glimpse of some of the attractions of the fair.

A Food Exhibition in London.

AN interesting Food Exhibition has just been held in Agricultural Hall, London. It was a display of the multitudinous food products of Europe, America and Australia, and was designed mainly with a view of bringing under the notice of the English public many varieties of preserved meat, fish, vegetables and fruit, together with the best methods of preparing them for the table. In addition to this there was a large collection of culinary and domestic apparatus of the most approved and ingenious kinds. There were altogether 200 exhibitors, whose stalls filled the body of the hall, and as these were not only interesting in themselves, but were arranged, for the most part, with much taste, a striking and picturesque effect was obtained. In tinned products the London Times says that America naturally took the lead. The exhibition teemed with her preserved meats, fish, fruits and vegetables. Australia was poorly represented, having nothing to show but her familiar beef and mutton tins, but this unfortunate circumstance is accounted for by the fact that this exhibition was thought of only a few months ago, and that Australian producers consequently did not have time to put in an appearance. England excelled in the mechanical department, which formed, perhaps, the most interesting and instructive part of the exhibition. The Continental exhibits, for the same reason as the Australian ones, were poor. They were only thirty in number, and consisted chiefly of wines, sardines and preserved fruits. In walking through the exhibition the infinity of uses to which gas is applied was notable. It acted as the motive power in most of the machines, and it seems entirely to have superseded coal in the more complicated cooking stoves and ranges. One remarkable apparatus is the "Crown" heater. By turning a tap of cold water into a comparatively small cylinder, which is so arranged inside as to present a large heating surface, a continuous stream of boiling water is obtained. The tinned meat is not without a rival in the London market. The variety of tinned products was amazing. One firm exhibited as many as two hundred sorts, the great majority of which were entirely unknown to the ordinary English housewife. Some ingenuity, of course, had been displayed in obtaining this variety, which embraced such bizarre preparations as "carried kangaroo" and "roast thrush"; but most of the tins were such as would commend themselves to the English palate. The exhibition was formally inaugurated by a luncheon, to which about fifty or sixty gentlemen interested in the food question were invited. The menu was entirely composed of preserved provisions, and, with the exception of some of the vegetables, which seemed lacking in flavor, and the tinned beef, which apparently no gravies, however cunningly devised, can effectually disguise, was a remarkable success. The "turtle" was from Jamaica. The other soups were very good; so were the fish, the curried beef, the fowl and the peas. As for the fruit, it was delicious; it even seemed to have improved in flavor by being canned. The pine-apple could not have been excelled, the fact being that that fruit is preserved after it attains a degree of ripeness and luciousness which would render it unfit for exportation.

Statistics of Suffrage in Europe.

THE relative degree of practical development attained by the principle of popular representation in the various countries of Europe may be seen from the following figures: In France there are 9,631,261 electors, viz., 26 8-10 per cent. of the inhabitants; in Switzerland, 542,552 electors, viz., 14 9-10 per cent. of the inhabitants; in Germany, 8,533,468 electors, viz., 20 2-10 per cent. of the inhabitants; in England, 2,312,990 electors, viz., 11 5-10 per cent. of the inhabitants; in Austria, 1,342,946 electors, viz., 5 9-10 per cent. of the inhabitants; in Portugal, 216,683 electors, viz., 5 4-10 per cent. of the inhabitants; in Italy, 605,907 electors, viz., 2 9-10 per cent. of the inhabitants, and in Belgium, 69,278 electors, viz., 1 8-10 per cent. of the inhabitants. The French Republic thus counts a larger proportion of electors than Switzerland, the country which was the first to adopt universal suffrage. This is partly explained by the consideration that the proportion of children to adults is smaller in France than in Switzerland. The relative number of foreigners having no vote may also possibly be larger in the latter country. The franchise shows an equal development in Germany. The difference between Germany and England is almost two to one in favor of the former country. The electoral body is also larger in Portugal, a country of pure monarchy, than in Italy or Belgium. Another fact worthy of attention is the extent to which the franchise is actually exercised by the electoral population in each of the countries mentioned, respecting which we have the following figures: France, 1876, 7,356,882, or 76 per cent.; Germany, 1874, 5,291,521, or 62 per cent; Austria, 1873, 153,155, or 66 per cent.; Portugal, 1867, 153,155 or 66 per cent.; Italy, 1876, 368,750, or 59 per cent.; Belgium, 1874, Senate, 36,063, or 69 per cent.; Deputies 45,184, or 71 per cent.

The Costliest Cellar in the Country.

WHEN the Union troops built their fortifications at Alexandria the commanding general and the engineers selected the site of Colonel Herbert's property as the best location for the magazine. And there they built the best magazine the money and skill of the Government could construct. Great massive walls of stone; deep, smooth-laid floors of brick; ingenious contrivances for protection against dampness, fire, frost, and rain, either from heaven or columbiads. It was water-proof, frost-proof, fire-proof, and bomb-proof, and was built down in the ground to last a couple of centuries or so. And when the war was over and the Confederate colonel returned home he had his home to rebuild, for war had swept it away. Here was this United States magazine on his estate. The Government needed it and cared for it no longer, and the colonel wisely built his home right over it, and now he has the finest, costliest cellar under any private house in the United States.

Biscuit for Horses.

A SINGULAR experiment is at present under trial in the French army. The Minister of War, anxious to reduce the bulk of provisions to be carried during a campaign, has ordered that a new kind of biscuit should be used as food for the horses. On the conclusion of the present manœuvres, the experiments will be rigidly tested. Two squadrons of cavalry and a battery of artillery will at once be put under the new system. The circular of the Minister directs all the details, and orders that a commission, composed of four officers and a veterinary surgeon, should see that the instructions are completely carried out and report on their progress and results. The selected horses are to be weighed and measured across the shoulders before the experiment commences, and two other squadrons of cavalry and a battery of artillery are to be selected, composed, as nearly as can be, of animals of the same weight and size. The latter are to be placed under the war allowance of fodder, and both at once to be subjected to the estimated average fatigues of a campaign. During twelve days the experiment will be followed out, while the officers charged with its conduct will constantly report on its results. The horses are to supplied with the new food on the first day of the campaign, without any transition or preparation for the change. The biscuits are to be broken up, but not to be molested, and the horses are to be watered before the meal.

Infants' Food.

THE French Commissioners on Hygiene of Infancy, in awarding the prize in a recent competition of essayists, report that the conclusions generally arrived at lead to the following recommendations: No child should be reared on artificial food when the mother can suckle it, but such food is preferable to placing the child with a wet-nurse, poorly remunerated and living at her own home. For successfully bringing up an infant by hand, it should be placed under the care of a conscientious, careful and experienced woman, should the mother not be well enough to take it in charge. The best milk is that of a cow that has recently calved, or similarly of a goat, to which should be added during the first week a half part of water, and subsequently a fourth, or less, according to the digestive powers of the child. Glass and earthenware should alone be used; no vulcanized India-rubber mouthpieces nor vessels containing lead ought to be employed. In the case of robust children, the offspring of healthy parents, when thus practiced, hand-rearing gives good results; but with sickly infants the risk is greatly increased, and where several children are thus reared together it generally results fatally in spite of any hygienic precautions that may be adopted.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

A Children's Party on H. M. S. Minotaur.

England has a genuine captain of "H. M. S. Pinafore" in Captain Rawson of the Minotaur, who has a delightful way of giving an occasional party to children, who swarm by the hundred to the quarter-deck of his big vessel. Precautionary measures have been taken to avoid possible mishaps by a child accidentally tumbling down a hatchway, disappearing through a port-hole, or taking a fatal dive through the interstices in the gangway; the boys and girls may dance or romp to their hearts' content, and Captain Rawson is not the man to let their amusements lag, while his middies enter into the fun of the affair as heartily as the juvenile guests themselves.

The New Italian Ironclad.

Another of those huge armaments with which Italy has of late been so amply providing herself was launched at Castellamare on the 29th of September, and King Humbert's arsenal can now not only boast of having equaled England in the production of a hundred-ton gun, but surpassing her by building the largest ironclad afloat. The Italia, as she has been named, was designed, like the Duilio, by Admiral Brin, and was begun in 1876. She has been built entirely of steel, is of 14,200 tons displacement, is armed with a spur some nine feet in length, and will carry four one-hundred ton guns, in addition to broadside batteries of smaller calibre. The engines are of 8,000 horse power, working twin screws. Her length is 400 feet, her breadth 75 feet, and her depth nearly 32 feet. The launch was conducted with considerable ceremony, Humbert and his Cabinet being present, and Her Majesty's ships Monarch and Thunderer and various other foreign war vessels attending to do honor to the occasion. The vessel having been blessed by the clergy of Castellamare, she was duly named by a daughter of Admiral Acton, the Minister of Marine, the young lady breaking the traditional bottle of wine over the Monitor's bows. The ceremony over, King Humbert returned to Naples in the Stiffetta dispatch-boat, escorted by the Italian and British men-of-war. At starting the Italian ships followed the King's vessel, with the British ironclads in the rear, but when half across the bay the order was reversed, and Her Majesty's ships Monarch and Thunderer took the foremost place.

The Anniversary of the Capture of Rome.

The withdrawal of the French troops from Rome on the declaration of war between France and Germany led to the occupation of the city by the Italian army, and the abolition of the temporal sovereignty of the Pope. It was on the 20th of September, 1870, that the forces of Victor Emmanuel, after a brief resistance on the part of the small army still at the command of Pius IX., succeeded in taking possession of the grand old city. In the following month a plebiscitum was held, by which the people declared their willingness to submit to the constitutional government of the King, and Rome was, in consequence, proclaimed the capital of the kingdom. It became at once the seat of the national Government, the royal residence was removed thither, and the succeeding Parliament held its sessions there. In commemoration of these events a grand civic and military demonstration took place on the 20th of September last, at which the procession and the ceremony of affixing a memorial tablet at the Porta Pia are the subjects of our illustrations.

The Mason Science College, Birmingham, England.

The new Science College at Birmingham, built by Sir Josiah Mason at a cost of $350,000, was opened on October 14th, in the presence of Sir Josiah Mason, who was apparently in good health, although the foundation-stone was laid on his eightieth birthday, in 1875. The inaugural address was delivered at the Town Hall by Professor Huxley. In the course of his discourse the Professor said: "I hold very strongly by two convictions: First, that neither the discipline nor the subject matter of classical education is of such direct value to the student of physical science as to justify the expenditure of valuable time upon either; and, secondly, that, for the purpose of attaining real culture, an exclusively scientific education is at least as effectual as an exclusively literary education." After this Sir Josiah Mason gave a luncheon to a numerous party at the Queen's Hotel.

The Restored Theatre Gymnase.

The new manager of this famous Paris resort, Victor Koning, has risen rapidly. He began in 1869 by writing gossip of the theatres. He was a little bit of a fellow, who wriggled in everywhere, who was always of exuberant gayety, and whose flow of animal spirits was inexhaustible. One day he became manager of La Renaissance. He pocketed a great deal of money. When Montigny died he got the management of the Gymnase, spent $40,000 in restoring it, and has made it the most attractive theatre of Paris. He has changed even the outside of the house; where there was a wretched lamp, he has put seven immense chandeliers, has added airy statues here, gilt brooms there, carpets and curtains everywhere. The petty chandeliers of the ceiling has been discarded, and a new one with 220 jets and cut-glass drops innumerable substituted in its place; the prevailing colors are white and gold, with very light green. The curtain is painted to look like velvet; the drop-curtain represents a curtain of satin embroidered with silver lace. The ceiling has been painted anew, and represents the four seasons. The Gymnase opened with "Une Innocente"—a one-act piece written by Cheri Montigny, son of Rose Cheri and the late manager.

A Race to the Market of Tahiti.

The Society Islands which have been recently annexed to France, are mountainous in the interior, and have a border from one mile to five miles wide of rich level ground extending from the base of the highlands to the sea. There are small lakes and lagoons to some of the islands, and all are watered by numerous streams, upon the banks of which or along the shores the inhabitants reside. The soil of the level tracts along the shores is a rich alluvial deposit, mixed with vegetable mold, and is, consequently, exceedingly fertile. Besides the bread fruit, these islands produce almost every tropical vegetable and fruit, including some peculiar to the group. The natives find their best market at Papeete, the capital of Tahiti, the largest of the group, and there is always great rivalry among them to be first at the landing with their boat-loads of supplies.

The Literary and Scientific Congress at Lisbon.

Two congresses have been held in Lisbon, Portugal, recently, under the presidency of the King and his father, of an international character. One was a literary congress, the other an anthropological; both were held in the library of the Royal Academy of Sciences. The members of both gatherings received from the royal family, the civil corporations and the élite of Lisbon high marks of appreciation. A banquet was served them in the royal palace of Ajuda, and a ball was given in their honor under the direct management of Queen Maria Pia.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE Second Chamber of the States-General of the Netherlands, by a vote of 41 to 20, has refused to re-establish capital punishment.

—A FRANCO-POLISH company has been formed for working, on the American system, the hitherto unprofitable petroleum wells of Galicia.

—IT is stated that the Sultan, while the cession of Dulcigno is going on, will call a meeting of the creditors of the Empire, against which England will protest.

—THE Premier of the Capetown Government telegraphs that the position is critical, the Pondos having rebelled. The magistrates at Isolo and Gotberg are in imminent danger.

—PERSIAN troops, to the number of 3,000, are raiding in the Kurdish villages near the western frontier. The main body of Kurds, after two ineffectual attacks on Beenab, are retreating.

—A NEW Servian Ministry has been formed, with M. Pirotsch-eatch as President of the Council and Minister of Justice, and with M. Leschjanin as Minister of War. The Young Conservative Party is predominant in this Ministry.

—THE Department of State is advised by telegrams from Mr. Osborne, our Minister to Chili, and Mr. Christiancy, our Minister to Peru, that the conference between the belligerent powers under the good offices of the United States has closed without any result.

—THE total population of South Carolina is 995,300, of which 490,327 are males and 504,979 females; 987,664 are natives and 7,642 foreign born. The whites number 391,871 and 604,233 are colored. The State census of 1875 showed a population of 925,441.

—FROM $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 worth of birds' nests are yearly imported into Canton, most of them coming from Java. They are very expensive, costing from thirty to forty dollars per pound. The nests are composed of pure gelatine, secreted by a species of swallow and deposited against a wall.

—THE Radical members of the municipality of Paris have begun to discuss a project by which the twenty district mayors would be elected instead of appointed by the Government. This would render the municipality largely independent of the Government, and is regarded as a reassertion of communistic principles.

—NEWS has been received from the West Coast of Africa of the death of Chaca, the Governor of Whydah. The funeral was to be celebrated by a massacre of natives, after which the King had announced his intention of holding the annual celebration in memory of his father. The celebration will last four months, during which 200 captured chiefs will be beheaded.

—ITALIAN opera is to be given in Cincinnati, next February, at the College of Music, on a grand scale. The principal parts are to be borne by Colonel Mapleson's company, but the chorus will be composed of 300 local singers, and there is to be an uncommonly big orchestra. The costumes and scenery, too, are to be of a correspondingly pretentious character.

—AT the Kent Assizes, Maidstone, Thomas McGrath, a seaman of the United States Navy, who killed a man in an affray at Gravesend in August last, has been convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labor. It was proved on the trial that the prisoner was greatly provoked at the time of the homicide, and that he had borne a good character.

—IN the sculling match between Elias C. Laycock, of Australia, and George E. Hosmer, of Boston, Mass., for $1,000, which came off on November 2d, over the Thames championship course, the Bostonian was defeated. Laycock rowed easily and won by three lengths. The weather was splendid and the river perfectly still. Hosmer was dead beat. The time of the race was 26m. 8½s.

—THE Constanze Theatre now building at Rome will be one of the largest theatres in the world. The auditorium is intended to hold 4,000 people, while the stage will contain an area of 800 square metres; the edifice, besides, being provided with a number of subsidiary salles for rehearsals, etc. The orchestra is to be invisible. It is said, however, that this magnificent building is somewhat deficient in acoustic properties.

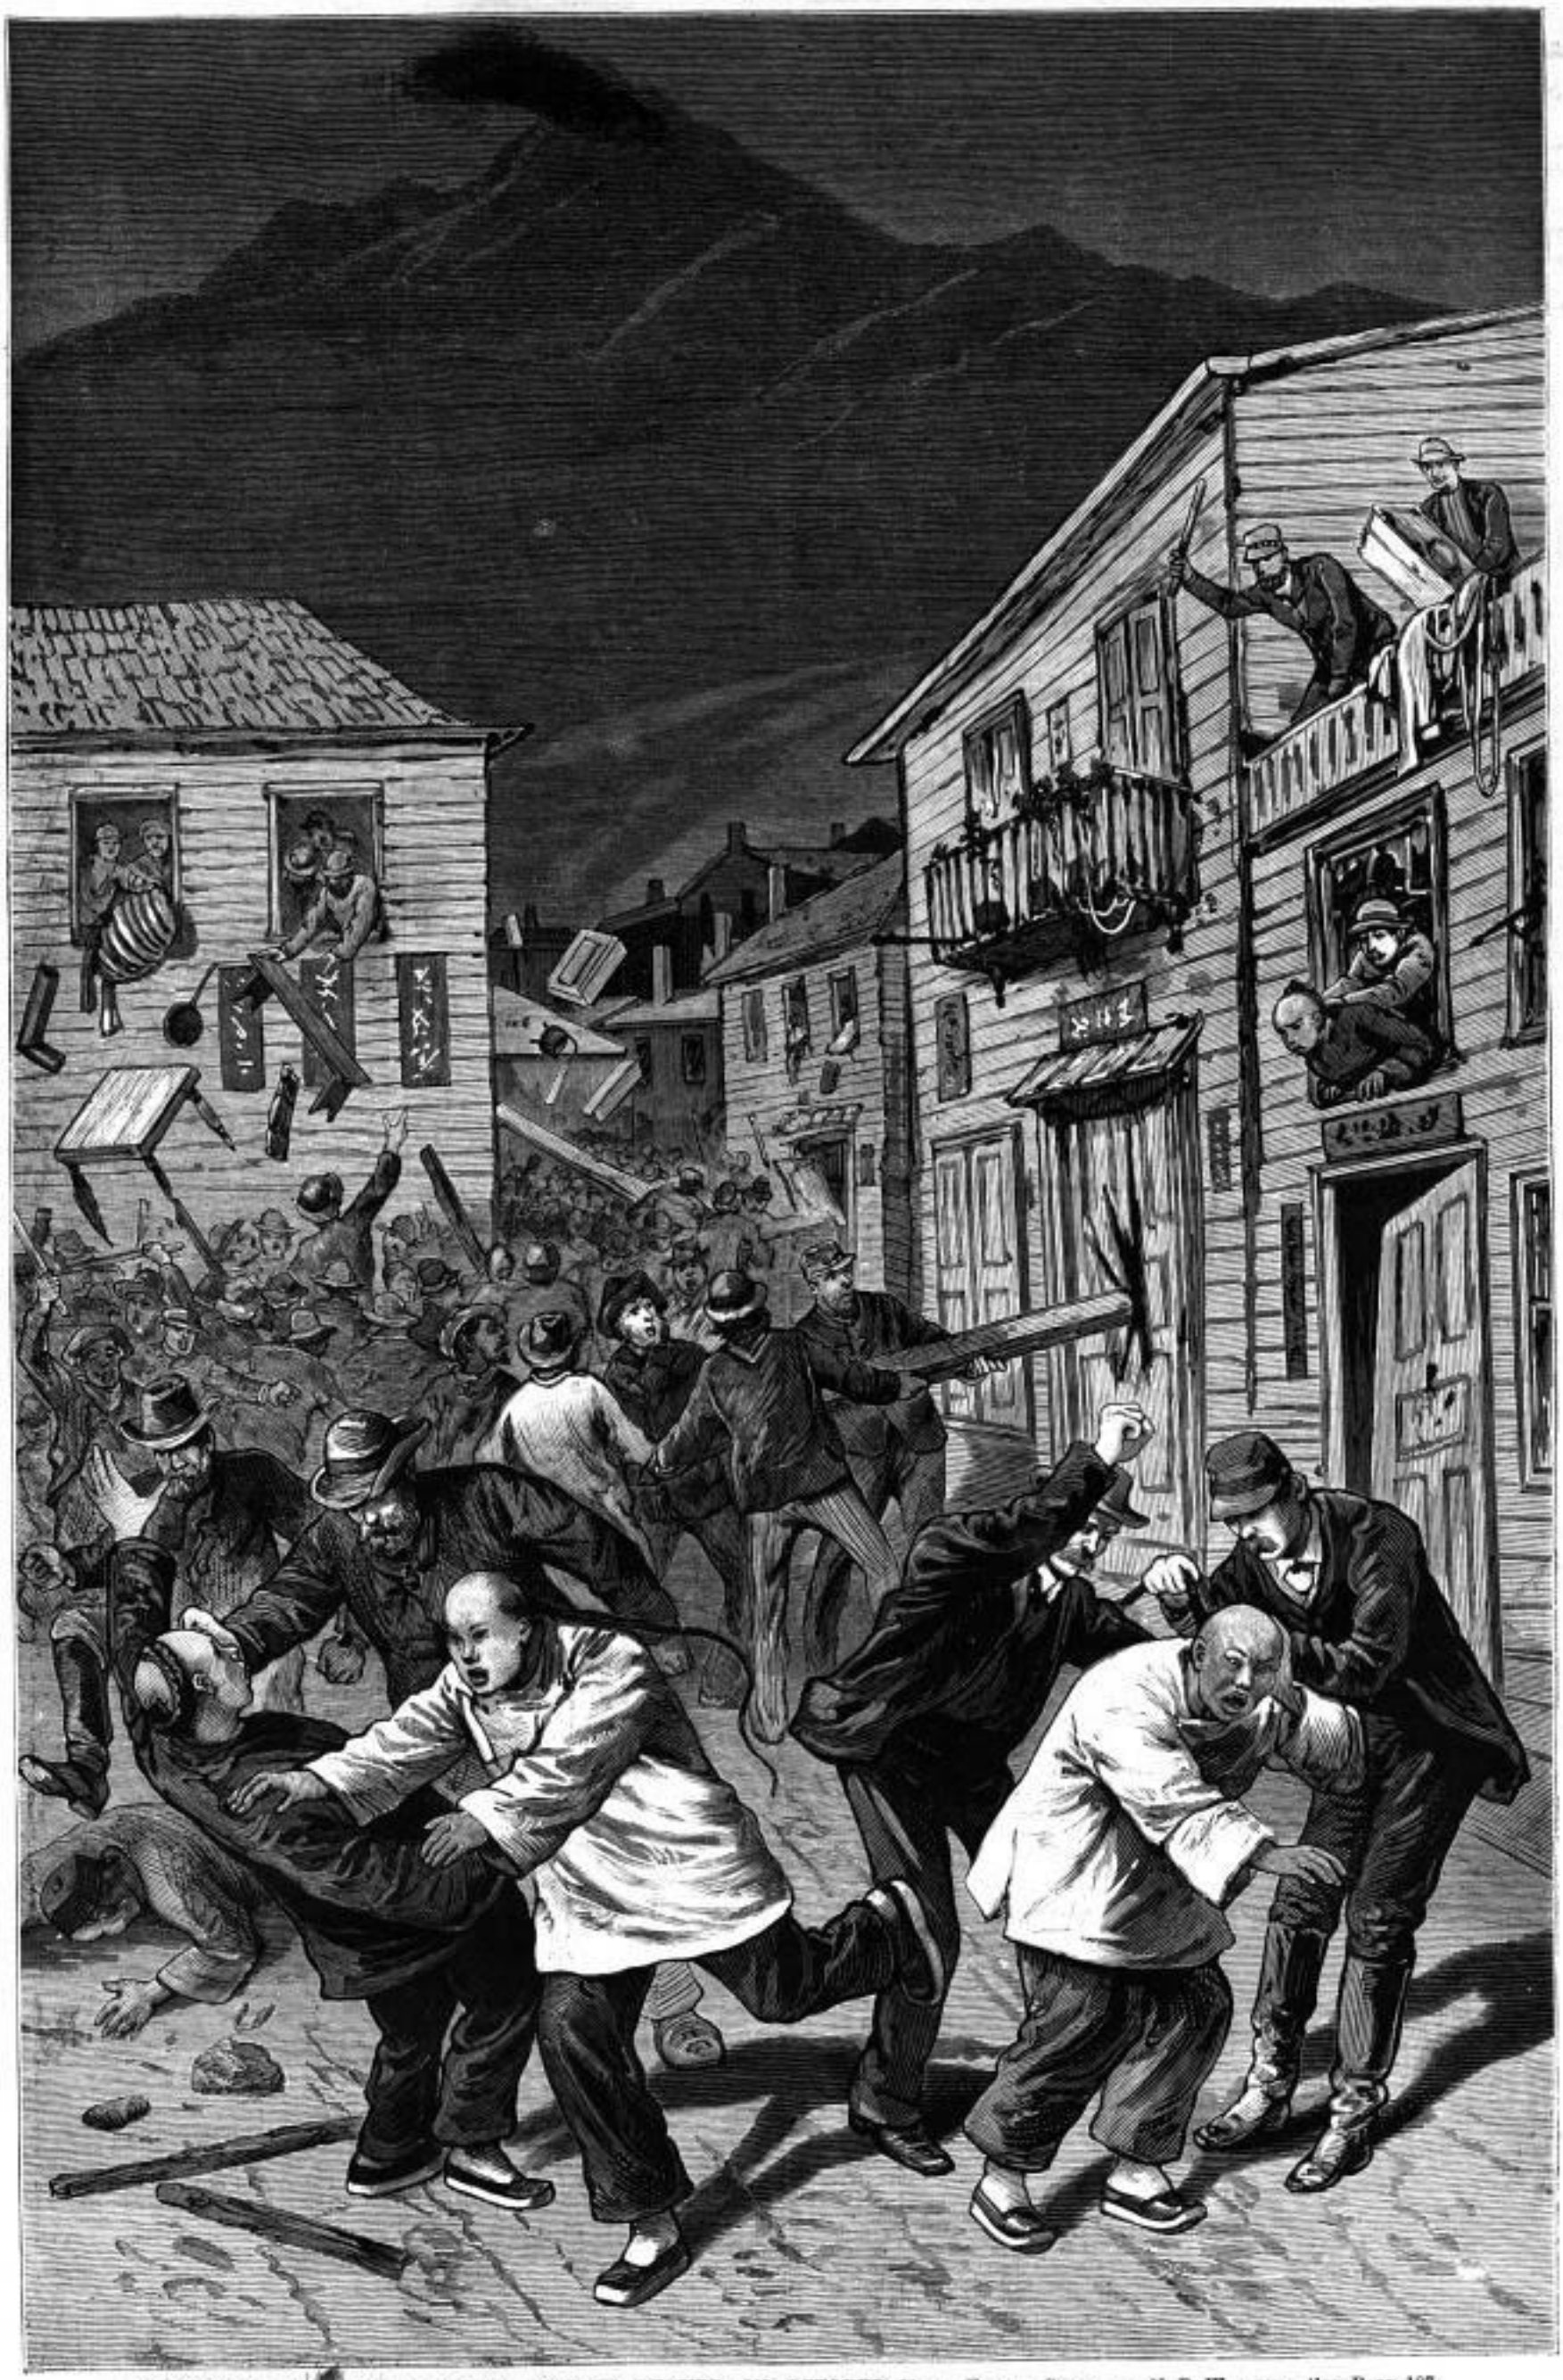
—THE Solicitor of the Treasury has lodged in the Court of Queen's Bench, Ireland, indictments for conspiracy in connection with the land agitation against Charles S. Parnell, John Dillon, Joseph Biggar, Thomas Sexton, T. D. Sullivan, Thomas Brennan and Patrick Egan. All except the two last named are members of Parliament. Mr. Brennan is secretary of the Land League, and Mr. Egan, a Dublin merchant, is its honorary treasurer.

—THE ex-Empress Eugénie has sold the "Villa Eugénie," a plain two-story residence on an elevation near the sea at the famous little watering place of BIARRITZ, on the Bay of Biscay, where she and Napoleon III. spent part of the Summer regularly from the time of their marriage until the desistence. The price paid by the purchaser, whose name has not been made public, is said to be $500,000, and the ex-Imperial estate will be cut up into building lots and resold.

—THE Paris Municipality has resumed its enterprise of rechristening thoroughfares. Subject to the consent of the Government, the Avenue MacMahon is to be styled Avenue Dutton, the Boulevard Haussmann is to be named after Carnot, and about twenty religious or Bonapartist names are to give place to secular or republican titles. It is to be presumed, however, that the Government will again overrule the expunging of M. Haussmann's name from the only which he embellished.

—HERR BITTER, Minister of Finance, in introducing the Prussian Budget, said the last financial year showed a deficit necessitating a loan of $1,250,000. The estimates for the year 1880-81 balanced, but part of the expenditure was extraordinary. The ordinary Budget showed a surplus of $5,750,000, of which $350,000 will be devoted to the remission of taxation. Herr Bitter foreshadowed an increase of the brewing tax, the tax on those exempted from military service, and those on Bourse banking operations.

—THE Royal Library of Berlin has just celebrated its first centenary in its present rooms. It was founded by Frederick William, "the Great Elector," in 1659, but for many years occupied rooms quite inadequate for the convenience of readers and for the storage of books. So, in 1780, it migrated to the King's Palace, in the left wing of which it has just completed its first century. When the Elector died, the library numbered 20,000 volumes and 1,618 manuscripts, while at present more than 800,000 volumes and 15,000 manuscripts are in the possession of the institution.



—THE American Bible Revision Committee has completed the revision of the English version of the New Testament, and has transmitted the result of its labors to England. The British committee will meet in November for final action, and the University presses of Oxford and Cambridge are expected to issue the revised New Testament in February, 1881. The Old Testament will be published two or three years after. The American revisers have given their time and labor for eight years without compensation. The necessary expenses have been provided for by voluntary subscriptions.

REPRISALS.

"I say not unto thee, until seven times; but until seventy times seven."

SOVEREIGN for beauty and blossom grace, like her
Who gained absolvement for her great love's sake,
Perchance thy soul shall one day suddenly wake
To feel contrition all its torpor stir,
And see the wistful eyes of loves that were Turned on thee, star-like, through night's vast opaque
Whose deepening shadows soon must overtake
Thy charms that infidelities failed to blur.

Even then, in that thy day of wrath, my tongue,
Which vainly implored thy pity when thy hand
Spared not to wound me, thus shall God beseech:
"Let all vicarious pain from me be wrung;
In peace past comprehending let her stand,
And Magdalen's benison her red robes bleach!"

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

CHAPTER XLIX.—RESTITUTION.

IT is three weeks since the death of Valentine. The Russian night is closing in as a crowd of travelers alight from the railroad carriages and pause upon the station. Among the throng is a tall and stately figure, plainly clothed in deep-black garments. A thick sweeping vail of crape effectually conceals her features, as with the crowd she stands for a moment irresolute, then, turning, descends the steps and walks hastily down the street. She proceeds but a few steps ere she sees that the tidal wave of excitement has swept the city. The street she is traversing leads through the business class of the public, and all along she passes groups of men conversing with every evidence of excitement. Youths hastening home from school come in clusters, gesticulating and talking loudly. Newsboys have more than they can attend to in supplying the continual demands for their latest editions, while at the corners and upon doorsteps are congregated the women of the neighborhood infected with this same overwhelming excitement. It is at one of these groups that she pauses.

"Can you tell me," she says, addressing them in their own language, "what is it that has so agitated the people?"

Instantly the women crowd around her, teeming with their rare gossip.

"And have you not heard?" cries one, a great, fat fishwoman, with arms akimbo. "Why, there has not been such a time known for years. Bless us, everybody is crying out with the shame of it! It was a heathenish thing. I for one never believed the fair noble guilty."

"But what is it?" urges the lady.

"Ay, what is it!" repeats another, mockingly, a contemporary of the first speaker, and elbowing her way to the front. "How can the lady make aught of such babble, but it is the way of the fishmongers of the lower market. No more head nor tail to their stories than there is to their rotten wares."

A severe altercation is imminent, which, however, is quelled by the repeated inquiries of the lady.

"It is simply this, madame," says a woman, apparently more intelligent than her companions. "It is found that the noble who was condemned to exile over a year ago is innocent, and the city is wild with excitement. She was one of the aristocracy, and now that she has been proven innocent the Order is wild and raving almost."

While she has been speaking, the figure of the vailed lady has leaned heavily against a post, and she stands silent for a moment.

"How was her innocence discovered?" she finally inquires.

The women crowd closer around her, and every one evinces a desire to talk, but the last speaker silences them with a glance of her bold black eyes.

"A dying woman confessed to the murder in the Hospital of the Blessed Virgin. She also left a written confession signed and sealed by the priest who attended her. This was given into the hands of the great Minister Toboskie, who handed it to the Czar. His Highness has sent seven of his highest nobles to Siberia to bring back the unfortunate lady."

"But who was the murderess?"

"Ah, that cannot be told. The nobles have the affair in their own hands, and they are closer than water with their business. The people dare not interfere, because the aristocracy say that it was for them this poor lady was exiled. I am sure all we wanted was justice; and, after all, it was no worse for a noble to suffer than for a low-born. And many of our own people have gone down innocent under the heel of the rulers." The black brows are drawn heavily together. "But it is as much as our lives are worth," glancing furtively around, "to breathe of it. Karl, the leader of our people, says that the nobles will avenge this wrong to one of their Order—avenge it upon the people. Karl himself, in his desire to hear of the news, approached too close to the state chambers, and was seized and beaten, and thrust out into the street like a cur, by one of the nobles. And he says that a warning was hissed in his ear that for every day that had been passed by the noble in the mines, that for every pang she had suffered, a life of the people should go down. It was Count Erkenstein who said this. You see, the lady was a great beauty and a great favorite. She was a court-belle, and half of the nobles of Russia were mad over her loveliness. But bad as the times are now, they will be worse if the great Minister Toboskie lives. Some say he was betrothed to the Lady of Ashhurst. And one does well to keep on the pleasant side of a member of his race. He is all-powerful with the Czar, and Karl says that if he does not require blood in return for the injustice done to his lady, he will punish us more bitterly. He will impose even heavier taxes upon us; he will press us down into the mire; he will hold a sword over us, and our children will go hungry for bread, while we will not dare say that our souls are our own. Why, when he discovered that the lady was innocent, he sought the great lawyer, Dornsdoff. They say he drove through the streets like a drunken man, with his horses steaming and white with foam; and he went to the lawyer, as he sat in his private office, and commanded his servant to strike Mr. Dornsdoff in the face. And, though the lackey obeyed, the lawyer refused to fight the count, which they say is the way they do in high circles, though for me, a good hand-to-hand tumble in the street is far better. Then the count drew his pistol and shot the poor lawyer where he sat. What a time over a woman! And yet we dare not interfere because, forsooth, they are the aristocracy. Beasts! we are like a pack of hunted sheep, scared of the wolves!"

"And he?" murmurs the lady, where she stands clinging to the post. "What of him?"

"Oh, thank the Blessed Virgin! it did not kill him, though a hair's breadth higher and the ball would have entered his heart—that heart that is all the protection the poor, down-trodden people have. He is getting well fast. He has a charmed life, the dear——"

"But the count?" urges the lady, and now the low voice thrills with wild impatience. "What of him?"

"Oh, it is the minister!" The warmth and eagerness die out of the woman's voice, which grows chill and sullen. "Saints of high heaven! He was like a mad man! He staggered up to the Monastery of St. Michael, and in the presence of the dear, grand abbot, shot himself through the head. It is where all the swift, fierce, dangerous lords of his race died—in the Monastery of St. Michael."

No one can see the convulsed working of that face beneath the thick vail. But when she again speaks, the women look at her curiously, for her tones are hard and hoarse.

"Then he, too, is dead?"

"No. He was too wild with excitement to take good aim, and he is lying up at the monastery at the point of death. The wound and his excitement brought on a fever, and they say that the abbot and the monks nurse him like a brother, while the physician of the Toboskies has a room in the monastery, and is by the count's side night and day."

The lady says no more, but glides out of the crowd, while the women resume their loud talking. Down the street she goes, and walks on and on and on, like one in a dream, and lost to all earthly surroundings. Finally the curious glances of the pedestrians, the cold, stiff wind, the falling, drizzling rain; and, above all, the weary, exhausted pain of long travel and exposure, arouse her to the present. She glances around her; and sees that her wanderings have taken her to a distant portion of the great city. A short distance off is a respectable hotel of the middle class, and to this she makes her way. She calls for a room which is given her, and, weak and exhausted, she throws herself upon the bed, while down in the street below she hears the murmur of many voices as they discuss her fate, and through the rain the newsboys' shrill shriek proclaims the last edition of the anxiously-expected paper.

CHAPTER L.—IN THE MONASTERY AGAIN.

IT is a tempestuous night. Around the sturdy corners of the monastery the fierce winds sweep with shrill cries, and the great pine-trees bend and moan in the blast, while the rain descends in torrents. Sitting alone in his private apartment is the Abbot of St. Michael. He sits with his face leaning upon his hand, and beside the small, bare table, upon which is his frugal supper—a mug of cold water and a few slices of brown bread, as yet untouched. Over the interior of the monastery is an intense stillness, upon which breaks only the roar of the tempest.

Minutes pass; then above the warring of the elements reverberates through the long, empty corridors the rumbling of the heavy iron knocker at the great door.

"Some poor homeless destitute seeking shelter," he murmurs, and, picking up his candle, he proceeds to the main entrance. There he opens wide the door, and, holding the light far up above his head, peers out into the tempestuous night. A strange vision confronts his wondering eyes—a vision with a white, worn face, with wide eyes glowing like carbuncles, and a great mass of amber, wind-swept hair that floats upon the gale—a vision of the woman he had last beheld in her prison cell.

So suddenly has she appeared that the abbot starts back and almost drops the candle in his intense surprise. But with the instinct of divine hospitality, he steps aside and assists her to enter. Then, after closing and bolting the door, he sets down the candle and looks at the woman. Yes, it is her. It is the same grand and lovely face that he first beheld in this very monastery, the same deep, dark eyes, the same golden flood of hair! Yet now a maniac wildness characterizes her appearance. Her hands are locked tightly. The wind has torn away her wrappings, and her plain black dress, heavy and soaking with rain, clings closely to her majestic figure. Father Salvatore is appalled beyond measure at her appearance, but says nothing save a few words of welcome, as he attempts to lead her to his apartment, in which a fire—an unusual luxury—is lit. But she resists.

"Where is he?" she says, and her voice is hoarse and unnatural. "Does he live?"

The abbot knows well to whom she alludes.

"Yes, he lives," he replies; "but to-night is the crisis. To-morrow's sun may see him——" He pauses suddenly at the wild, agonized light of the woman's eyes.

"Dead," she supplements, wringing her hands. "Oh, I know it—I know how he killed himself for me. He is dying—dying!"

"You must compose yourself, daughter," says the abbot, firmly. "You, who have endured so much, must not sink now. All hope is not lost."

"I cannot compose myself," she cries, fiercely. "Never until to-night have I acknowledged that I loved him. Now my pride is smitten—my strength gone. I am willing for the whole world to know that I would be his slave but to have him live! Though he believed me guilty, he did everything for my welfare that mortal man could do. He even offered me his honor. He would have taken me away, all stricken with shame as I was, the very night before my exile; but I scorned him—I refused him. I mocked at him even while he laid his life, his eminence, his god-like love at my feet. In my blindness I have treasured up anger against him. I have been mad—mad! And now that he discovers my innocence, God has taken him from me. Oh, my darling—my darling!" She bows her face on her clinched hands, and weeps passionate, bitter tears.

"I have defied him all my life," she sobs. "I have insulted and abused him—he who has been faithful to me through it all. What would I not give to be able to kneel at his feet, to look up in his eyes and say, 'I yield, I yield!' But he is avenged—I am punished for my pride and rebellion, and my punishment is greater than I can bear. May I see him? Oh, Father, do not deny me this last blessing!" Her dark, passionate eyes look beseechingly up at the abbot.

He looks in indecision at her wet garments, her wild, haggard countenance.

"Your attire must be changed," he says, "before you can do anything. Fortunately, I can supply this need. A few years ago a wealthy but insane lady escaped from her keepers and came to the monastery, where, owing to the excitement, she died. For some reason her robes were never taken away. In the cupboard of my chamber they are folded away. Go in there, my daughter, and change your wet garment, and then I will see what can be done."

She dare not refuse, and in a few moments returns dressed in the garments that fit her unusually well.

"Now may I see him?" she says, eagerly.

"If you will promise to compose yourself, and to be perfectly silent while in his room."

"Oh, I promise, Father—I promise!"

"Then follow me."

He leads the way down the hall, up a long flight of broad stone steps, and finally pauses at a closed door, where he turns to her, in his grand and handsome face a great pity.

"You must prepare yourself for a great change, daughter," he says. "Owing to his past troubles and this last fearful blow, Count Toboskie is almost unrecognizable."

She bows her head, and in the next moment the door opens and she is in the chamber. The apartment is rather larger than is customary in a monastery, and for this reason has been selected for the use of the count. On a stand by the iron bedstead burns a candle, and on either side of the bed sits a monk, and the old distinguished physician of the Toboskies. At the far end of the room a lighted taper burns softly before a crucifix. Noiselessly Maize approaches the bed, and stands looking down upon that gaunt, massive figure lying motionless upon the bed.

Despite the abbot's warning, she is not prepared for the appalling alteration in this face that she last saw filled with its passion as he stood pleading for her love. She is stupefied—literally stricken dumb with her horror. That white, drawn face with its bluish shadow, those sunken, closed eyes rimmed with dark circles, those locks of iron-gray hair escaping from under the bandages that conceal the fatal wound, evidence of his madness—do they belong to Toboskie, the haughty, invincible minister? Her hands shut tightly and she staggers back and would drop were it not for the strong arm of the abbot that catches her before she falls.

"Where is your endurance?" he says, sternly. "You promised me composure."

After that reproof no sign of further weakness escapes her. She takes her seat by the bed, and all night long remains there with her wild, haggard eyes fastened upon the unconscious man! Sometimes he lies in that appalling stupor so like death, at others he is tossing in delirium. He cries aloud to her—he lives again in the past, he beseeches her love in his broken, native eloquence—that eloquence that has moved a nation—he tells the story of his wrecked and desolate life in the past year, when he scorned the ease that was denied her, sleeping upon boards and living upon prison diet. She sees all—all the great, blinding, idolatrous love that has encompassed her—all that fierce, silent suffering, that Pagan self-persecution that have been his! And all the while slowly down her face roll those blinding, bitter tears. The past is forgotten; its pain and injury vanish. Of only one thing is she conscious—the peril of this grand and mighty life for which, in the sudden abandonment of her nature, she has acknowledged her affection. The love abused and outraged against which she has so long battled, now asserts itself, never again to be vanquished.

It is a night never to be forgotten in all the many stages of suffering through which she has passed; long, dreary hours stand out as the blackest of all her life. At last the dawn breaks. Through the narrow, deep-set window that looks out at the east, struggle the first wan rays of the young day. The heavy, haggard-eyed woman lifts her face, with its blanched loveliness, and shudders as the light of early morning smites it. Over that figure that has grown so still and motionless bends the physician. For minutes he remains thus, then he straightens himself, and upon him fastens the eyes of the girl with their shrinking, piteous fear.

"What is it—life or death?"

The doctor looks at her, and as he speaks there is a curious choked sound in his voice.

"He will live!"

The girl says not a word, but leaving the chamber goes out and stands with her face to the east. With the coming of the new day dawns for her also a new life.

CHAPTER LI.—THE ABBOT'S HISTORY.

SHE stands thus for an hour. Then a hand is laid upon her arm, and she turns to confront the abbot. In his face has come a wondrous change, as though touched with invisible fingers. He seems to have grown younger by a full decade, and his eyes are bright with the light of youth. She looks at him steadily and notes the grand, handsome face whose natural austerity has briefly vanished—the dark firm gray eye, the low broad brow, the majestic figure clothed in its priestly garb, and belted in at the waist with the long gold chain from which depends the cross, and is again struck with the inappropriateness of this kingly man to the gloom and rigor of a monastic life.

"He will live, daughter!" The words are breathed forth in a low, thrilling voice of rapture.

"Yes, Father," she answers. "I have been standing here wondering how I could give thanks. But, Father, I did not know that you were so strongly attached to him."

Up over the strong, massive face of the abbot creeps a swarthy flush, and he stands silent for a moment.

"I do not wonder," he says, at length, "that you are surprised at my interest in Count Toboskie. Between you and me there is a bond of affinity, for we both love one object. And as I see no human reason why you shall not in the future become the count's wife"—a great flush steals over the girl's lovely face—"I will tell you my story which has never before passed my lips. It is a simple story enough, and very short, yet in it is comprised the wrecking of a life. Forty years ago I was an inmate of Duke Toboskie's castle, the duke being the father of the present count, who was then not born. I believed my benefactor to be a distant relative of mine. I had lived with him since I could remember, and in his treatment of me he was indeed a father, making no distinction between me and his then only son, Leopold, whose mother died at his birth. Leopold and I were about the same age, and were reared together. We had both of us swift, dark, impetuous passions, but I was sincerely attached to him, and until we were five-and-twenty years of age our wills never clashed. Then it was my ill-fate to love a woman upon whom the young lord had also centred his affections. If he had the superiority of wealth and title, I, perhaps, had the advantage of greater physical attractions; so it was an open warfare between us.

"The object of our mutual passion was a high-born lady, beautiful as a dream. I loved her as I loved my soul, and upon her had staked all that grand, free faith of my youth. I trusted her as I trusted my God! And when, by the aid of that mute but eloquent language in which lovely women are so well versed, she testified her preference for me—when her eyes, her hands, her actions, all bore evidence of her fondness for me—I was unutterably blest. Though not as wealthy as my rival, I had a fortune that could keep my loved one in luxury, and a title that I was told had descended from an ancient branch of my family, and which was now extinct.

"That pleasant, fraternal intercourse that had so long existed between Leopold and I was now eternally ruptured. A bitter and implacable enmity had taken its place, and we never met without cutting sneers and hard words. The duke saw with sorrow the growing hatred between us, and in every way endeavored to reconcile us, but in vain. To do him justice, I must acknowledge that in his conduct he was entirely impartial. He begged us not to allow a woman to sunder that bond of sacred unity between us, and a woman, he persisted in declaring, who was not worthy of the passion we bestowed upon her. She was a Hungarian countess, and he affirmed that her race was fickle and false to the bone, and that she herself was known all over the continent as the most heartless and accomplished coquette of all the courts. Although we had heard something of this reputation before, we both refused to believe it, and pronounced it base calumny.

"Proud of her triumphs, of her captivation of two men of such a desperate but powerful race as our own, she had duped and deluded us until our faith was so great that we swore by her, and each believed himself the favored one. But finally her partiality for me became so apparent that even Leopold could no longer remain blind to it. It was one evening that we both met at her rooms, and each solicited her society at an entertainment given by a noted minister. She stood for an instant silent, then smilingly accepted my escort. Leopold rushed out of the room, but not before he had flashed upon me a glance so full of hatred and malignity that, despite my pride and desperate courage, I shuddered as I heard him mutter something about revenge between his clinched teeth. I knew that he was a true friend but an implacable enemy; still I did not think his hatred would take him so far.

"It was the night of the ball. At the door of the Princess Hotel stood my carriage, in the countess's reception-room stood myself. She had just entered the room in her trailing robes and flashing jewels, when the door of the apartment was thrown open and Count Leopold entered. His face was aflame with excitement, and his eyes burned with a dangerous fire. He came and stood directly before us.

"'Madame,' he said, addressing the princess, 'I have this night discovered my father's secret, which for years has been so well guarded; this man by your side is a bastard—is the son of my father's mistress.'

"I was young and hot-blooded, and had been reared in all the pomp and glory of a powerful but dissolute court, and at that insult a lion's wrath fired my veins and I leaped at my enemy, giving him the lie as I did so. There would have been bloodshed in that luxurious chamber, for we were like wild brutes mad for their prey, had not the countess interposed herself between us. She besought us to compose ourselves, and we loved her so madly that her word had even influence with us when the Blessed Mother herself could not have moved us. We stood silent, glaring at one another and panting like gladiators, but not to have saved our souls would either of us have raised a hand in her presence.

"Then she spoke. 'Lord Protosque,' she said to me, 'I trust that Count Leopold's excitement has misled him. If so, you can easily prove it. If not, of course all intercourse between us must cease.'

"'I tell you, madame, it is no mistake,' cried Leopold, his voice tremulous with passion. 'I hold myself responsible for what I say. This man is the duke's illegitimate son—my father has palmed off his bastard upon society.'

"Still I stood motionless in the presence of my idol; but I swore a deadly oath that for what had passed I would have his life. I expected the countess to resent my insult, as I should any indignity put upon her; but, to my agony, she looked coldly upon me."

"'Of course, my lord,' she said, 'this unfortunate affair will cancel this and every other engagement we may have until you are able to vindicate your honor.' Then, turning to the count with that bewitching grace, she laid her hand in his, and continued, with her dazzling smile: 'In this emergency, count, may I depend upon you for an escort?'

"He seized her hands and pressed them passionately to his lips; then, without once glancing at me, they left the apartment and descended to his carriage, which was also in waiting, and I heard them whirled away. I stood for a moment as if stunned; then, like a madman, I rushed out of the house and sought the duke. God knows how he ever had the courage to tell me, but at last the horrible truth dawned upon me. He assured me of his remorse and agony; he reminded me of the love he had borne for me all these years; he swore that between his two sons he had known no difference save to love me the stronger. But what was this to a man stripped of the proud purple of aristocracy—dashed from the pinnacle of fame and distinction into the very slough of shame! I was a bastard—I, who had been reared in all the pomp and grandeur of the noble; who had been deferred to as to a sovereign; who already had been appointed Minister to a foreign court, and had the promise of rich fame and glory! Looking back now, I think no agony ever touched mortal being greater than that which crushed me in that hour. I dropped like a felled brute at my father's feet, cursing him with a bitter, lasting curse. He attempted to console me. He assured me that, sustained by him, no one would dare to point the finger of scorn at me. But I was like a maniac. My manhood, my pride, my honor—where were they? I had none. I was crushed to the death. I lay there until nightfall; then I rose and swore that I would disappear for ever from the world in which I once shone—giving my rivals and enemies no chance to triumph over my downfall.

"I kept my vow. I became a wanderer upon the face of the earth. I had no name, no country, no home! For years I led this roving life; then, weary of it, and destitute of all interest in existence, I bethought myself of the monks of St. Michael, among which more than one lord of my father's desperate race had lived and died. I determined to be one of them. Changed beyond all recognition, I returned to my native country. I found that the duke had married again, and that soon after my departure Count Leopold, on discovering that he had been but the amusement of the beautiful Hungarian, who married an Austrian prince, had shot himself through the heart.

"I entered the monastery unrecognized, and from one degree to another finally rose to the abbotship. Soon after my taking the monks' Order, a son—the present Count Toboskie—was born to my father. I watched his progress, and in secret have cherished a strong affection for him. I have gloried in his rapid advancement, his proud distinction. He has become the most powerful statesman of his country; so would I have been had I not been stricken down in the rich promise of my manhood. In him I live again. I seem to feel that he has reared up the proud existence that I would have lived if that crushing blow had not withered me. I felt that it was for this purpose he was born. And when, at his father's death, he stood as patron to the monastery like his predecessors, I felt that I was blessed unutterably.

"The fierce rebellion died out of my heart, the rankling wounds healed, and the peaceful waters of resignation at last flowed into my soul. And at last there came a time when the fair white face of my faithless idol no longer came between me and the Virgin as I knelt at the shrines, and I looked back upon my wrecked life with composure, and to the future with patience and fortitude. I have yielded to my fate. But when I saw the same wretchedness descending upon my brother that had also crushed me—I refer to the misery of love—my old rebellion awoke in my breast. I knew that the count loved you with that fiery passion of our race that oftener begets misery than aught else. Even when I visited you in prison I tried to reconcile you to him. I also visited him the very day before your departure for Siberia, and, by the right of my holy calling, was permitted to say much more than any other living being. I used every endeavor to persuade him to listen to the outcryings of his heart and save you, persuaded as I was that you were innocent. But until last night, when you informed me differently, I thought my prayers to him had been in vain. But now, thank God! the clouds are swept aside. Though you both have been down through the deep waters of affliction, you have come up strengthened and purified. And now you have my history."

He does not tell her that at those times when he has been thrown in her presence, the spell of her matchless loveliness has roused those instincts that have long slumbered under the rigor and self-denial of his life; that that strong and fiery nature, pressed down into its narrow groove, has wrestled with the iron will that suppresses it, has struggled and sickened with the mad yearning for the old existence from which he is for ever sundered.

In the past weeks that have dragged his brother so near death, he has prayed and fasted and purified himself from that insidious touch of his earthly nature. He has besought of Christ this life so dear to him, and now that it has been granted him, he has consecrated himself anew to his God. He has come to the girl fresh from his cell, wherein he has for ever quenched every lingering spark of his old instincts. Never again can he come under their dominion. He stands there in the fresh light of the young day, all earthly weaknesses put for ever beyond him—his affections purified, himself alienated from the sin of the world, and exalted to a new sanctification. And in his grand and saintly face pours the full flood of the radiant sun, saluting his renunciation, as he stands there in his full and perfect purity, facing the woman whose loveliness has been the one object that could move his strong and mighty soul in its abnegation. But now he looks upon her untouched by any carnal weakness, as she stands there in her radiant beauty, her soul filled with a vast pity and admiration for this man who has "known sorrow," and unconscious that upon her also rests the brand of illegitimacy.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE JOHNS HOPKINS SEASIDE LABORATORY.

WE give on page 192 illustrations of the Johns Hopkins Seaside Laboratory, which has been located during the past season at Beaufort, on the coast of North Carolina. The work of the laboratory, which was organized three years ago, has been to study the marine life of Southern waters, and has included, among other investigations, an elaborate study by Professor Brooks of the development and propagation of the oyster. The first season's work, in the Summer of 1878, was carried on in Hampton Roads, Va., at Fort Wool, situated on a small artificial island known as the Ripraps. A goodly volume of "Scientific Results," which appeared in the following Winter, attested the activity of the working party. In the following Spring the laboratory was established at Crisfield, on the "Eastern Shore" of Maryland, a village which is the centre of the oyster trade for the Southern Chesapeake, and which, in both a figurative and a literal sense, has been built upon oysters. Here the natural history of the oyster was carefully studied, and the complete success which attended efforts to fertilize artificially the eggs of the oyster showed that the artificial propagation of this important shell-fish may in time become a prominent feature in the oyster culture. Later in the season the party was completely and ignominiously routed by invading armies of musquitoes, which came in clouds, rendering mere existence scarcely tolerable, to say nothing of the utter impossibility of microscopical and other scientific work. The party accordingly decamped, retreating to their former quarters at Fort Wool, where the remaining portion of the season was passed.

This season it was decided to push still further south in order to get within reach of the more Southern or semi-tropical forms of life, and, after some deliberation, Beaufort, N. C., an old and well-known collecting ground, was fixed upon as headquarters for the Summer. In addition to this laboratory, under direction of Professor Brown, which was intended especially for the pursuit of original investigations, a Summer school of zoology was organized by Dr. G. F. Clarke, and located at Fort Wool. At the latter station systematic instruction in marine zoology was afforded to less advanced students.

The establishment of Agassiz's well-known Summer school at Penikese gave a great impetus to seaside work, and the number of "Summer Schools" and laboratories has since been steadily increasing. Through the studies thus carried on and by means of the magnificent collections which the yearly expeditions of the United States Fish Commission are accumulating, our knowledge of the marine life of our eastern coast is very rapidly advancing. Much of the knowledge thus gained is of the utmost practical value to our fisheries and kindred industries, though, in the opinion of most of the scientific men engaged in the work, the purely scientific side of such studies is of still more importance.

The leading work of the Johns Hopkins Laboratory has thus far consisted of studies upon the embryology or development of various forms of marine life. To get at facts of this nature necessitates the most careful and patient work, weeks or even months of study and observation being often required to work out satisfactorily the complete history of a single form. The methods of work vary with different animals. Many adult forms may be taken along the shores or on the piles of wharves. Others are found only in deeper water, and must be procured by the employment of dredges or trawls, which are dragged over the bottom, scraping up large quantities of sand, gravel, mud and other material in which the animals are found. A much smaller number of adult forms swim at the surface. The embryos, or young, with few exceptions, swim freely through the water. In calm weather, and especially at night, they often crowd to the surface in almost incredible numbers; and to these microscopic creatures the so-called "phosphorescence" of the sea is largely due.

To capture these minute free-swimming animals fine gauze nets are employed. These are towed through the water at the end of a long string, or are attached to handles and used by hand as "dipping-nets." The creatures thus captured may be kept in aquaria and studied with the microscope as they develop from day to day or week to week. The earliest stages may be obtained by keeping the adults in aquaria until they produce eggs and the young embryos hatch.

Our illustrations, most of which are from sketches by Henry F. Osborne, show some of the apparatus and the way it is used, and one or two of the interesting forms of life are shown. One represents a party "dipping" and "towing" from the little steam-launch, which has proved of invaluable, or, rather, indispensable, service in the work. The curious group shown in another is a good case of what is known as "commensalism"—an association of a number of animals which form a sort of community, but do not prey upon each other. In this case a "hermit-crab" has taken possession of an old shell, from the mouth of which project his curious stalked eyes, his claws and feelers. Like Sinbad, the hermit carries a living load upon his back, for three sea-anemones have attached themselves there, and likewise a whole colony of barnacles. And a curious little red crab has in turn anchored himself to one of the sea-anemones. Thus the unfortunate hermit must drag about with him, nolens volens, a retinue of liberal adherents, which, doubtless, reap in part the benefits of his foraging.

The town of Beaufort, though a rather out-of-the-way place, is a well-known Southern Summer resort. The prevailing cool sea-breezes render the climate very delightful, and this is itself a sufficient inducement to many. But there are many other attractions, such as fishing, bathing, boating, etc., and the town is rather picturesque. The attention of the newly-arrived visitor is immediately arrested by the old-fashioned windmills which grind corn for the omnipresent "pone," or Southern corn-bread. Seen from a distance, they give a decidedly Dutch look to the place—an impression which is, however, scarcely sustained by a nearer view of the battered and weather-beaten old houses of which the village is largely composed.

It is proposed to resume the work at Beaufort next Summer, and it is not impossible that a permanent laboratory may be there erected if the location is found, upon thorough trial, to be well adapted for that purpose. At present a large dwelling-house, situated at the water's edge, is made use of for a laboratory. This mansion enjoys no little celebrity from its architectural superiority to its less pretentious neighbors, and from the fact, often reiterated by inhabitants of Beaufort—that it is built of cypress wood and copper nails!

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

A Useful Exhibition is being held in Glasgow of apparatus for the utilization of gas, electricity, oils, etc., and of hydraulic, architectural, mining and sanitary appliances.

Engineers are engaged daily in making surveys for the purpose of determining the site of the projected tunnel under the St. Lawrence between Hochelaga and Longueil.

The Remains of a Lake Village have been discovered in a marsh at Reguzia, near Milan. They include, it is stated, shavings of flints apparently cut with bronze instruments.

The French Government has assigned to M. Pasteur the sum of 50,000 francs, to assist him in conducting his important researches on the contagious diseases of domestic animals.

At a Concert given every night in the garden of the Palais Royale, Paris, the orchestra is placed in the vicinity of the fountains, which are illuminated by eight splendid Siemens lamps.

By a Decree of the French Minister of Public Instruction the Ethnographical Museum at the Trocadéro has been organized. Dr. Hamy and M. Landrin have been appointed conservators.

It is Officially Announced that an International Congress of electricians will meet in Paris on September 15th, 1881. The Congress will be preceded by an international exhibition of electrical appliances.

Dr. Watt, of the Bengal Educational Department, who is now engaged in the examination, at Kew Gardens, London, of his extensive collections of Indian plants, has been deputed by the Government of India to visit Manipur, on his return from Burmah, for the purpose of reporting on the forest and vegetable resources of that territory.

The British War Office authorities have detailed a full company of the Royal Engineers for instruction in the art of military ballooning, in lieu of the small detachment hitherto employed in the experiments. The company selected is the Twenty-fourth (Field Company) at Aldershot, and it will be placed under the command of Captain Elsdall, R. E.

By Letters from Senegal, published in the French papers, we learn that the survey of the country between the Senegal and the Niger is in progress. Three different topographical parties have been formed to determine the position of the intended ports and the route of railway intended to connect the two streams. The work must be quite finished by the month of May, 1881.

The Removal of the Natural History Department of the British Museum to its new site in Cromwell Road, South Kensington, has actually commenced. Though it was universally admitted that there was great lack of room in the old building, the situation of the new Museum, save in strictly official circles, is not admired. The respective keepers of the mineralogical and geological departments, Professor N. S. Maskelyne, F.R.S., and G. R. Waterhouse, have resigned, and have been succeeded by Mr. Lazarus Fletcher, F.G.S., and Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S.

A Large Number of rooms have been added to the French Museum of National Antiquities at St. Germains, and are awaiting a formal opening by the President of the Republic. In one of them have been collected a series of relics of Roman age relating to religious ceremonies and inscriptions; in a second room has been disposed a large number of bas reliefs and statues exhibiting arms and scenes of military life; and in the third room were found many sepulchral monuments showing the arts and trades as practiced during the Roman rule in Gaul. Some rooms have been already opened to the public, and in one of them is the celebrated Antun mosaic representing Bellerophon triumphing over Chimæra; execution and preservation are both wonderful.

The "Mittheilungen" of the German African Society, of which six parts are published, contains much very valuable information on recent explorations in Africa by German explorers. We have details of the progress of Herr Schütt's expedition in the Lounda region, of Rohlfs's attempt to push southwards from Tunis, of Dr. Büchner to Musia Juava's kingdom, of Dr. O. Lenz's determined and, so far, successful attempt to push southwards through Morocco to Timbuctoo and beyond. We have, besides, records of the doings of the International African Association, and of the various other societies for the exploration of Africa throughout the world. In the double number (4 and 5) Dr. Reichenau gives a detailed list of the collection of birds sent home from Malanga in Angola by Herr Schütt.

The New Expedition dispatched by the London Missionary Society to Lake Tanganyika, and consisting of the Revs. A. J. Wookey and D. Williams, with Dr. Palmer, left Zanzibar on June 14th, and, crossing to the mainland at Bandani, marched thence to Ndumi. Here they remained for a few days, until they got their full complement of paguri, and finally started for the interior on June 21st. Accomplishing some twelve or fifteen miles a day, they reached Mpedpwa on July 14th, and were most kindly received by the Church Missionary Society's agents. They were to recommence their journey to the lake on July 19th. Their caravan consists of 300 men, the chief of whom is Uba, who accompanied the Rev. Roger Price, when the bullock-wagon experiment was tried some four years ago.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

SIR THOMAS BOUCH, the engineer of the Tay Bridge, is dead.

MARIE VAN ZANDT, the American singer, has made her reappearance at the Opera Comique, and has again vindicated her position as a public favorite.

MR. J. O. CHAPLEAU, Premier of the Province of Quebec, has declined a portfolio in the Dominion Government. Mr. Caron has accepted the position of Minister of Militia.

PRINCE ALEXANDER of Bulgaria has received from the Russian diplomatic agent at Sofia a casket containing three antique rings which belonged to the late Empress of Russia, three letters he had addressed to her, and a portrait of his grandfather. He has also received intimation that the Czarina bequeathed him a legacy of 2,000,000 rubles.

PROFESSOR FAWCETT does not allow his official work as Postmaster-General of Great Britain to interfere with his professional duties as Professor of Political Economy at Cambridge. He has already arranged his lectures for the term—and that action seems to dispose of the rumor that he was coming to the United States to study our postal and telegraph systems.

MINISTER MARSH, who is to resign his position at the Italian Court on account of ill-health, is seventy-five years old. He was Minister to Turkey under President Taylor, having previously been a Vermont lawyer and a member of Congress. His life has, however, been devoted mainly to studies in philology and physic, concerning which he has published a number of valuable works.

THE memorial cross of the Prince Imperial, on Chiselhurst Common, is made of gray granite, on which are sculptured the Imperial bees. On one side is inscribed this sentence from the Prince's will: "I shall die with a feeling of profound gratitude to Her Majesty the Queen of England and for all the Royal family, and for the country where I have received during eight years such cordial hospitality."

ULYSSES S. GRANT, JR., the youngest son of ex-President Grant, was married to Miss Fanny Chaffee, daughter of Senator Jerome B. Chaffee, of Colorado, on November 2d. The wedding took place at the New York residence of the bride's father, No. 26 West Fifty-eighth Street, and, in accordance with the wishes of the contracting parties, was strictly private, only the immediate members of the two families and a very few intimate friends being present.

A GERMAN revivalist has come to the front in the person of the Rev. F. Von Schlesenbach. He has been made a secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of the United States, and is holding meetings in Boston. He is called the German Moody on account of a slight resemblance to Moody, but he is said to be a better speaker and logician. His strongest point, however, is that he is a converted atheist, and his most effective assaults are upon the sin of unbelief.

CARDINAL GUIBERT, Archbishop of Paris, has received a letter from the Pope expressing his appreciation of the action of the French bishops in defending the Religious Orders, the persecution of which, he says, may lead to grave calamities. The Pope regrets that the ministry did not accept the declaration of the congregations, which the Government itself originally suggested. He considers it his duty to protest against the present proceedings of the ministry, and to defend in all parts of the world the institutions and rights of the Church.

FLAGS were displayed in all parts of Milan, Italy, on November 2d, in commemoration of the battle of Mentana, in which Garibaldi encountered the Papal and French troops in his invasion of the Papal States in 1867. General Garibaldi was enthusiastically received. Two hundred thousand people were assembled. There was no display of police, and perfect order prevailed. General Garibaldi seemed overcome with emotion. Among those who received him were many survivors of the revolutionary battles and French campaign. All the railway stations from San Damiano d'Asti to Milan were decorated with flowers, and General Garibaldi's journey seemed like a triumphal progress.

THE memorial to the late Prince Imperial is now nearly completed, and will shortly be erected on Chiselhurst Common. The memorial trunic cross, which is made of gray granite, is twenty-seven feet high, resting on a solid granite base, led up to by steps. It is beautifully carved and ornamented in front. On each side is the inscription, "Napoleon Eugène Louis Jean Joseph, Prince Impérial, born in Paris 16th March, 1856, killed by the enemy in Zululand, 1st June, 1879." On the back of the memorial the following extract, from the last will and testament of the Prince, will be inscribed: "I shall die with a feeling of profound gratitude to her Majesty the Queen of England, and all the royal family, and for the country where I have received during eight years such cordial hospitality."

PRINCE ALEXIS of Russia is the most awkward antagonist the Czar has to meet in regard to his marriage. The Prince has made a written demand to the Emperor to ratify the private marriage he made with Reuteru's niece eight years ago. The ceremony was legally performed in the presence of the Minister of Finance himself, and the Czar, now begging the good-will of an offended family, has to remember to his regret that he has persecuted a beautiful and virtuous girl and deprived Russia of the best finance minister the country ever had. The Grand Duke Constantine shares his wife's antipathy to the favorite, and has besides a good argument in the Czar's inconsistency. Alexander having a year ago expelled Constantine's eldest son, Nicoli (of Khivan fame), from the Russian army for having contracted a romantic marriage at Orenburg with the Policemaster's daughter.

MLLE. HUBERTINE AUCLERT, the celebrated French advocate of woman's rights, is described as a blue-eyed brunette of distinguished appearance and delicate features. Her age is about twenty-five. She is the daughter of a rich landholder, and was educated in a convent. In early life she attracted notice by the manner in which she considered Christianity as a sort of republican communism. Coming of age, she claimed her share of the paternal heritage, and to the horror of her six brothers and sisters, went alone to Paris in 1873 to live there. She became acquainted with other ladies of advanced views, and in 1876 founded the society called "Le Droit de Femmes," the object of which is to obtain political and social rights for women. The members of the society number about 150. Every Wednesday evening about thirty of them meet in Mlle. Auclert's apartment to discuss their interests. Mlle. Auclert spoke at the Workingmen's Congress held in Marseilles in 1879. She is not a brilliant orator, but earnest, sincere and energetic. She possesses a handsome patrimony and lives on her income.

OBITUARY.—The Marquis Campana, the Roman archæologist, died at Rome, aged 72; Dr. Hippolyte Peisse, member of the French Academies of Medicine and of Moral and Political Sciences, and an officer of the Legion of Honor, died at Paris, aged 73; Sir William Linton, an eminent Scottish surgeon, died at Deerfield, in his 86th year; Herman Theodore Vanschmid, the author of "Camoens," and other dramatic works, died at Munich, aged 65; Bernard Reiter, the French dramatist, died at Marseilles, aged 76; Peter McCall, a well-known member of the Bar of Philadelphia, died at Overbrook Station, in his 72d year; Solon Robinson, for many years the agricultural editor of the New York Tribune, died at Jacksonville, Fla., on Nov. 3d, aged 73.

HON. GEORGE C. LUDLOW, OF NEW JERSEY.

GUBERNATORIAL VICTORS IN THE LATE ELECTIONS.

HON. GEORGE C. LUDLOW, GOVERNOR-ELECT, OF NEW JERSEY.

HON. GEORGE C. LUDLOW, who was last week elected Governor of New Jersey by a majority of some 400 or 600, is a gentleman in the prime of life, having been born just fifty years ago in Milford, Hunterdon County, in that State. He graduated from Rutgers College, at New Brunswick, in 1850, and three years later entered upon the practice of the law in that city. He early acquired a leading position at the Bar, and by his industry and fidelity to the interests of clients has established a firm hold upon the solid regard of all classes of the community. While a pronounced and aggressive Democrat, and participating actively in the political conflicts of his time, he never held any political office until 1876, when he was elected to the State Senate, in which he served with credit to himself and his constituency. During one session of the Senate, he held the President's chair, and during his entire term was a member of some of its most important committees. Mr. Ludlow is a gentleman of fine tastes, of genial manners, and more than ordinary independence of opinion. His friends anticipate from him a successful and honorable administration.

HON. HOBART B. BIGELOW.

THE Hon. Hobart B. Bigelow, of Connecticut, just elected Governor of that State by 2,300 plurality, is at present the Mayor of the City of New Haven. He was born at North Haven in 1834. The first sixteen years of his life were spent in his country home, where he led the usual life of a country boy, including the "schooling" obtainable in such localities. He commenced business for himself just before the war. In 1861 he took a large Government contract for furnishing "gun parts" for 300,000 Springfield muskets. This took about three years, during which time he had in his employment 300 men. After the war he carried on his business at the same place, until its increase made a removal to more commodious quarters necessary, and in 1867 he removed to Grapevine Point. Eight years ago the Common Council of New Haven appointed him a member of the Board of Supervisors, and he held the office five years. In 1874 he was appointed by Mayor Lewis a member of the Board of Fire Commissioners for the term of three years, and declined a reappointment at the expiration of his term. In 1875 he went to the Legislature, where he was a very popular member, and did good service on the Committee on Banks.

The qualities that have made him successful are industry, a mind capable of dealing with large matters, quickness in decision, "pluck," justice in his dealings with all, and friendliness. His private life is irreproachable; he gives freely of his abundance, he is kind to and considerate of his employés. December 3d, 1878, he was elected Mayor of New Haven by a majority of 2,387.

HON. ORAN MILO ROBERTS.

THE Hon. Oran Milo Roberts, re-elected Governor of Texas, was born in Laurens District, South Carolina, July 11th, 1815, and when quite young his family moved to Alabama, where he was educated. He graduated at the University of Alabama, at Tuscaloosa, in 1836, and moved to Texas in 1841, settling in the eastern part of the State, where he has since resided. He was District Attorney of his district in 1844-45, having been appointed by Governor Houston; appointed District Judge in 1846 by Governor Henderson, and continued on the District Bench until 1851. Upon the death of Hon. Abner S. Lipscomb, Associate Judge of the Supreme Court, in 1856, Governor Roberts was nominated by the Bar of the City of Austin to the vacancy, and was elected. In 1861, while still Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Governor Roberts was elected, from Smith County, a member of the Constitutional (Secession) Convention, of which he was made president by acclamation. In 1862 he resigned his seat on the Supreme Bench and entered the Confederate Army, and was elected Colonel of the Eleventh Texas Infantry, with which he served in the Trans-Mississippi Department, in "Walker's Division," during the greater part of the campaigns of that corps in Arkansas and Louisiana. In 1864, and while still with his command, Governor Roberts was elected Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Royall T. Wheeler. After the close of the war, he returned to his home in Smith County, and resumed the practice of his profession; was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1866, and made Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of that body. On the 24th of August, in the same year, he was elected by the Legislature a United States Senator for the unexpired term ending March 4th, 1869, but was not permitted to take his seat. From 1868 to 1870 Governor Roberts was a Professor in the Law School at Gilmer, Upshur County, still practicing his profession.

In 1874, upon the accession to power of a Democratic State administration, he was reappointed by Governor Coke to his former position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and was elected to the same position by the people, under the new Constitution, February 15th, 1876, which office he filled until nominated for Governor by the Democratic State Convention in July, 1878, receiving an unanimous vote of the Convention, after the withdrawal of all the other candidates. Thereupon he resigned his position as Chief Justice, to take effect October 1st, and was elected Governor, November 5th, 1876.

HON. ALFRED HOLT COLQUITT.

THE Hon. Alfred Holt Colquitt, re-elected Governor of Georgia, was born in Walker County, Georgia, April 20th, 1824. His grandfather was a Virginian. His father, Walter T. Colquitt, a United States Senator, was one of the most influential Georgians of his day. Governor Colquitt graduated at Princeton in 1844; went to Mexico as major, United States Army, 1847; acting as aid to General Taylor; was elected to Congress in 1852, at twenty-six years of age; declined a unanimous nomination in 1854; was in 1856 and 1860 delegate to the National Democratic Conventions and a Breckinridge elector; entered the Confederate service as captain of the Sixth Georgia Infantry; became major-general and won distinction as the "Hero of Olustee"; was delegate to the Seymour Convention in 1868; in 1870 was made on the same day President of the State Democratic Convention and President of the State Agricultural Society, a place he was re-elected to for six years; in 1872 was delegate to the Baltimore Convention; in 1876 was elected Governor of Georgia by 80,000 majority, the largest majority ever received in the State; in 1878 was elected President of the great International Sunday-school Association, and has just been honored with a re-election to the gubernatorial chair.

HON. DAVID H. JEROME.

THE Hon. David H. Jerome, of Michigan, was born at Detroit on the 17th of November, 1829. On the death of his father, which occurred when Mr. Jerome was an infant, his mother went to Central New York, but returned in 1843 and settled in St. Clair County, where Mr. Jerome was educated. In 1853 he went to California and engaged in mining, but returned to Michigan in 1854 and embarked in business at Saginaw City, where he has resided ever since, and is now the senior member of the hardware firm of D. H. Jerome & Co. In 1872 he was authorized by Governor Blair to raise the regiment apportioned to the Sixth Congressional District, and was commissioned commandant of camp, with the rank of colonel, to prepare the regiment for the field. In 1863 he was appointed on the State Military Board, of which he continued a member and president until the year 1873. In 1872 he was elected to the State Senate, and served six years. During his entire Senatorial career he was Chairman of the important Committee on State Affairs. He was one of the Commissioners to prepare a new State Constitution. At present Mr. Jerome is President of the Saginaw Valley and St. Louis Railroad and of the Saginaw Street Railroad Company. He is also a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners and a trustee of the Michigan Military Academy. Religiously, he is an Episcopalian, and has been a vestryman in the Episcopal Church for twenty-three years. Mr. Jerome's majority for Governor is about 30,000.

HON. ALFRED HOLT COLQUITT, OF GEORGIA.

SIGN-LANGUAGE OF ANTS.

THAT ants have some kind of sign-language has been proved by Sir John Lubbock in one of his recent papers. It is unquestionable that if an ant discovers a store of food her comrades soon flock to the treasure, although this is not invariably the case. It has been urged that this fact, taken alone, does not prove any power of communication. An ant observing a friend bringing food home might infer, without being told, that by accompanying the friend on the return journey she might also participate in the good things. This argument has been met by Sir J. Lubbock's compelling the ant who found the treasure to return to the nest empty-handed. If she took nothing home, and yet others returned with her, he argues, there must have been some communication between them.

As the result of carefully conducted and striking experiments, he concludes that ants are in possession of something approaching to a language—that they are able to ask their friends, when occasion requires, to come and lend them a helping hand. Relatives are invariably recognized. Young ants reared from eggs taken from a nest were, when they reached maturity, introduced to the maternal abode, and although the old ants could never have seen them until that moment, yet in all the cases (ten) they were undoubtedly recognized as belonging to the community; a stranger ant is invariably at once attacked and killed.

It would seem that the recognition is not personal and individual, and the fact that they recognize their friends even when intoxicated, and that they know the young born in their own nest even when these have been brought out of the chrysalis by strangers, seems to indicate that the recognition is not effected by means of any sign or password.

The political convictions of ants are deep-rooted. When a queen was introduced into a queenless nest, she was at once attacked and destroyed; it would seem as if ants which had been long living in a republic could not be induced to accept a queen.

Japan's Armament.

THE nation that may advance with hostile intentions against Japan a few years hence must be prepared to count the cost. In 1872 Japan established an arsenal at Tokio, Osaka and Ojl on plans furnished by French artillery officers. Three years later, so well had the native workmen learned their duties, the Tokio arsenal turned out 90,000 caps, 45,000 ball and blank cartridges, 101,500 Snider cartridges, and 20,000 rounds of artillery ammunition. At the Osaka arsenal during the first year of its completion 200 4-pounder bronze field-guns were finished, and 100 4-pounder mountain howitzers, besides the wood and iron work of several field batteries, and 3,000 sets of harness and horse equipments.

Railroad Statistics.

THE lines of railways in the five divisions of the earth cost, in round numbers, $36,000,000,000, and would, according to Baron Kolb, reach eight times round the globe, although it is but little over half a century since the first railway worked by steam was opened between Darlington and Stockton, September 27th, 1825, and between Manchester and Liverpool, September 16th, 1830. It is shown that in France, previous to the existence of railways, there was one passenger in every 235,000 killed, and one out of every 30,000 wounded, whereas between 1835 and 1875 there was but one in 5,738,800 killed, and one in 380,450 wounded, so that we may infer that the tendency to accidents is yearly diminishing. Railway traveling in England is attended with greater risk than in any other country in Europe. A French statistician observes that if a person were to live continually in a railway carriage and spend all his time in railway traveling, the chances in favor of his dying from a railway accident would not occur till he was 960 years old.

Proposed Classical Expedition.

THE following letter from Professor Charles Eliot Norton is published in the Harvard Register: "The Executive Committee of the Archæological Institute are now making arrangements for the investigation of the remains of an ancient Greek city upon Turkish soil. The necessary concession from the Turkish Government has been applied for, through the Department of State, and there is no reason to doubt that it will be granted. It is probable that work will begin with the opening of the Spring in February. The expedition will have at its head Joseph T. Clarke, and as his first assistant Francis H. Bacon. The work to be done is of such extent and variety that the committee are desirous to obtain volunteer assistants. The means at their disposal do not permit them to offer any salary; but board and lodging will be provided at the cost of the Institute at the site of exploration. The inducements for a young man interested in classical studies to join the expedition are very great. Such an opportunity has never before been offered to our students. It is an opportunity to unite adventure and discovery with study, and to become familiar with one of the most interesting regions of ancient civilization."

Poverty and Crime.

THE Irish criminal and judicial returns for 1879 show the connection that exists between poverty and crime. The number of indictable offenses committed during last year was 8,089, the highest total since 1872, and no less than 1,130 more than in the previous year. The offenses determined summarily, however, showed a decrease of 12,389, as compared with the figures of 1878, chiefly under the head of "punishable drunkenness," such offenses having fallen from 107,705 to 99,921. The decrease of drunkenness Mr. Neilson Hancock, in his introductory report, ascribes to the Sunday Closing Act, which was in operation during the whole of 1879. As regards the more serious offenses, punishable after trial by jury, the returns for 1879 compare very unfavorably with those of 1878. In the latter year this class of offenses numbered 2,986, whereas last year they advanced to 3,842, showing an increase of 856, or 33 per cent. Offenses against property were more numerous in 1879 than in the previous year, but the greatest increase occurred under the head of intimidation and malicious offenses against property. In 1878 the former numbered 157, and the latter 582, whereas last year they reached the high figures of 750 and 704 respectively. Taking together, the increase in these two offenses was no less than 111 per cent.

The Horrors of Russian Criminal Law.

As to the manner in which Nihilists are treated in prison the following case may serve as an example: L. H. was arrested for a small press offense in November. He was placed in a cell so small that it was almost impossible to stand upright in it, while walking was out of the question. The window was broken, and the stoveless dungeon soon filled with snow and ice. L. H., who had only his trousers and shirt on when imprisoned, was left without any additional clothing, without being even for one moment removed from this cell for five months. The only covering given him was a thin blanket, thrown in at night and taken away in the morning. The fact that torture is applied in Russian jails is so well known that the relatives and friends of prisoners continually try to convey them poison in order that these unhappy victims may escape the terrible sufferings they are subjected to. The mother of H—— herself supplied her son with prussic acid "in case he should be questioned." In the case of Solovieff, one Trapp publicly boasted "he would soon make the prisoner speak in all tongues," a boast which he would undoubtedly have tried to execute but for the threats of the Nihilist Committee, who so effectively intimidated the prison authorities that Solovieff was "only hanged." "We willingly risk our lives," a Russian exile said to me lately; "we die gladly in our cause: the only thing we do fear is the torture. Most of us carry poison: but this is now so well known that doctors are always in attendance to administer antidotes at the first sign of poison having been taken."

Projected Improvements at Montreal.

A GIGANTIC scheme of harbor improvements, costing about $7,000,000, has just been launched at Montreal, and if carried out, even in a modified form, will make Montreal one of the finest harbors on this continent. The plan originated with and was submitted to the Board of Trade by James Shearer, who is a practical mechanic and a leading manufacturer of old standing in the city. Mr. Shearer's plan is to divert the current of the St. Lawrence opposite the city into the channels between St. Helen's Island and the southern shore, and this he proposes to do by having various obstructions removed from this channel, and running a dam or "peninsula," as he calls it, from Point St. Charles to the west end of the city to St. Helen's Island, midway in the river, thus stopping the current from running through the present main channel between the city and St. Helen's Island. The practical advantages that will accrue to the city and harbor from the carrying out of this project are several. In the first place the dam will prevent the shoving of ice opposite the city, and the consequent flooding of the Griffintown district, which is annually very destructive to property and will make of this a still-water harbor. It is estimated that the construction of the dam, which would be 2,700 feet long and 900 feet broad, would raise the water two feet in the river, and lower it ten feet in the harbor. This would give a head of twenty-five feet for mills, elevators and factories, and the transportation of freight. The dam would afford a roadway across the river, upon the construction of a bridge from St. Helen's Island to St. Lambert, thus removing the necessity of a tunnel. This could be utilized for a railway, a road for carriages and foot passengers. These are the main results anticipated from the carrying out of the project.

FUN.

WOMAN is the Flora and man the fawner of creation.

THE grub makes the butterfly when the grub is hot biscuit.

"SWANS sing before they die." They have to if they sing at all.

COAL is so black that it is wonderful how a dealer can make a ton so light.

MUCH as he loves roast beef, John Bull is continually getting into an Irish stew.

IT is said that King Alphonso's palace had hanging in the front window a sign inscribed: "Boy Wanted."

THE young woman who witnessed her young man carried away by a balloon saw her beau of promise in the sky.

IT strikes one just a little odd to hear an orator surrounded by a halo of Chinese lanterns pour out invectives against Chinese cheap labor.

EXCITED OLD OFFICER (to new footman): "Now, Patrick, call me a cab." Pat (who thinks this a dodge to try his sincerity): "Och, no, your honor. It's not meself that'll be calling you names, at all!"

"ANYTHING new or fresh this morning?" a reporter asked in a railroad office. "Yes, replied the lone occupant of the apartment. "What is it?" queried the reporter, whipping out his note-book. Said the railroad man, edging his way towards the door: "That paint you are leaning against."

COUNTRY BANKER (to shaky customer): "Are you aware, Mr. Scollvan, that your account is overdrawn a hundred or so?" Scollvan: "Certainly I am, sir. Don't bother me about such trifles! I don't go howling about the country when you've a hundred or so of mine! Your information is superfluous either way! Good-morning, sir!"

"WHY didn't you mend my book-strap, mother?" asked a boy of twelve. "I couldn't, George," replied his mother; "I had company this afternoon, and had no time." George bore his disappointment as bravely as he could, but he was heard to mutter between his teeth: "I notice that I have to do my work just the same, no matter how many fellers come to see ma."

IT was his first appearance at church, and in order that he might sit perfectly still and keep his little chatter between his teeth, he was told that a big dog would bite him if he didn't keep that quiet. The little fellow cast several glances up and down the aisle, and at last, just in the most interesting part of the minister's prayer, startled the congregation by piping up: "Mamma, where is the dog?"

A PROMISING youth recently surprised his father by asking: "Father, do you like mother?" "Why, yes, of course." "And she likes you?" "Of course she does." "Did she ever say so?" "Many a time, my son." "Did she marry you because she loved you?" "Certainly, she did." The boy carefully scrutinized his parent, and, after a long pause, asked: "Well, was she as near-sighted then as she is now?"

ON his way to his apartments he stopped under the window of a pawnbroker on Sixth Avenue, and with violent knocking and shouts, attracted the attention of that estimable tradesman who, putting his head out of the window, fretfully asked the business of his visitor. "I want to know the time," cried the curator. "What do you mean by waking me up to ask such a stupid question?" roared the pawnbroker. "Stupid question!" howled the curator, clinging to a lamp-post. "I like that. Where else should I ask for the time—haven't you got my watch?"

SEVERAL days ago a white man was arraigned before a colored justice, down the country, on a charge of killing a man and stealing a mule. "Wall," said the justice, "de facks in dis case shall be weighed with carefulness, an' ef I hang yer, taint no fault ob mine." "Judge, you have no jurisdiction only to examine me." "Dat sort o' work 'longs ter de nuigier justice, but yer see I'se been put on a special. A special hez de right ter make a mouf at a s'preme court of he chooses." "Do the best for me you can, judge." "Dat's what I'se gwine ter do. I'se got two kinds ob law in dis court—de Arkansaw an' de Texas law. I generally gins a man de right ter choose for hisself. Now, whut law does yer want, de Texas or de Arkansaw?" "I believe I'll take the Arkansaw." "Well, in dat case, I'll dismiss yer fur stealin' de mule—" "Thank you, judge." "An hang yer for killin' de man." "I believe, judge, that I'll take the Texas." "Wall, in dat case, I'll dismiss yer fur killin' de man—" "You have a good heart, judge." "An' hang yer fur stealin' de mule. I'll jis take de 'casion fresh ter remark dat de only diff'rence 'tween de two laws is de way yer state der case."

FISK & HATCH.

MANY of the most extensive factories, foundries and railroad buildings in this country are covered with the well-known ASBESTOS ROOFING, which for many years has been accepted as the only standard substitute for tin. Its advantages over the gravel roofing are that it weighs less than one pound to the square foot finished, thus saving in many instances more than its entire cost in the difference between the expense of the heavy timbers actually necessary for the support of the gravel and the light timbers and walls required for the ASBESTOS ROOFING, which weighs only about an eighth as much. It is also adapted for steep or flat roofs, and can be readily applied without the aid of skilled labor. The H. W. JOHNS' M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, New York, are sole manufacturers of the genuine, and will send samples without charge to those interested.

Rupture

DR. J. A. SHERMAN—AND THE ONLY DR. SHERMAN, known to the public for the past 25 years or more for his successful method of treating Rupture without the annoyance and injury trusses inflict—may now be consulted weekly at the New York and Boston offices. Dr. Sherman is the discoverer of the only known cure for Rupture by local external treatment.

Patients from abroad can receive treatment and leave for home same day. During treatment any kind of active exercise or labor can be performed without interfering with the treatment, and with safety from the dangers of strangulated Rupture. HIS BOOK ON RUPTURE gives the most reliable proofs from distinguished professional gentlemen, clergymen and merchants of his successful practice and popularity therefrom throughout this country and the West Indies. The afflicted should read it and inform themselves.

It is illustrated with photographic likenesses of extremely bad cases before and after cure, and mailed to those who send ten cents. PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 251 Broadway, New York.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M. D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to Royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Princess and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

Facsimile of Brush.

Made of Pure Bristles, not wires—elegantly Mounted and Carved Back.

IT IS WARRANTED TO

CURE NERVOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE BILIOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE NEURALGIA IN 5 MINUTES!!
PREVENT FALLING HAIR AND BALDNESS!!
CURE DANDRUFF & DISEASES OF THE SCALP!!
PROMPTLY ARRESTS PREMATURE GRAYNESS!!
MAKES THE HAIR GROW LONG & GLOSSY!!
IMMEDIATELY SOOTHES THE WEARY BRAIN!!
MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

IT RARELY FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, WHERE THE GLANDS and FOLLICLES ARE NOT TOTALLY DESTROYED.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London.
New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents:—I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. C. Bridgeman, D.D."

[From the Mayor of Saratoga.]
August 16, 1880.

"I cheerfully testify to the merits of Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush. It cures my headaches within a few minutes. I am so pleased with it I purchased another for my wife. It is an excellent Hair Brush, well worth the price, aside from its curative powers."
JAS. B. CHAPMAN.

218 Fulton Street, New York, August 21, 1880.

"I would Not take $1,000 for my Brush

if I could not replace it."
PLINY F. SMITH.

Mr. Smith is a gentleman well known in this City as a Law Publisher, and also as a Director in several Public Institutions of New York.

"Domestic" Sewing Machine Co., New York, August 16, 1880.

DR. GEO. A. SCOTT—Dear Sir: Permit me to add the testimony of my wife to that of the many others who have been benefited by the use of your Electric Brush. She has for years been a sufferer from Neuralgia in an acute form, but since I obtained for her one of your Brushes, she has experienced entire relief. Please accept her sincere thanks.
HENRY BARTLETT.

Round Lake Camp-Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 5, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years.
Rev. J. B. ROGERS, Superintendent."

THE EQUILIBRIUM OF PARTIES.

A RECENT British reviewer, in commenting on the oscillations of political power in England, and on the uncertain tenure by which the Liberal Party holds its nominal majority in Parliament, explains both of these phenomena by referring them to the present unnatural distribution of political forces between the two great historical parties which divide the suffrages of the English people. By this "unnatural distribution of political forces" between the so-called Conservative and Liberal parties of Great Britain he means that in these parties, as to day constituted, there are a great many real Liberals who are politically ranked with the Conservatives, and a great many real Conservatives who are politically ranked with the Liberals.

It does not require much insight into the constitution of the Republican and Democratic parties, as they exist at the present time in the United States, to discern in them the traces of the same unstable equilibrium resulting from the same cause. On the two great leading questions of public policy which call for the most immediate action in Congress—the currency and the tariff—we find, with regard to the first of the topics, a great many Democrats who are as sound in their views as the best of the Republicans, and a few Republicans who are as unsound in their opinions as the worst of the Democrats; while, with regard to the second of these topics, we find a great many Republicans who are as much in favor of a revision of the tariff on revenue principles as the most enlightened of the Democrats, and a great many Democrats who are as much in favor of a tariff for protection as the most determined advocate of protection in the Republican ranks.

This unnatural distribution of political forces is partly advantageous and partly injurious in its consequences. Among its advantages we may cite the fact that it offers a safeguard against sudden and radical changes, whichever of the two parties, in the mutations of power, may be charged with the administration of the Government. For instance, if in the recent Presidential election the Democratic Party had been successful in both the Executive and Legislative branches, we might have still felt reasonably sure that the hard-money wing of the party, in conjunction with the Republican minority in Congress, would have been strong enough to prevent legislation in the interest of the "flat money" Democrats. In like manner, the Protectionist wing of the Democrats in alliance with the Protectionist forces in the Republican ranks would have been strong enough to defeat a radical revision of the tariff in the interest of "revenue only"—much more, a revision in the interest of theoretical Free Trade. And, as it is, with the Republicans retained in the Executive administration of the Government, and with a small Republican majority in the popular branch of Congress, we may be sure that Republicans like Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, and his coadjutors in the House of Representatives, will side with the soft-money Democrats in opposing necessary legislation for the settlement of our currency on a sound and permanent gold basis; and we may be equally sure that Republican revenue reformers in the West will be ready to unite with the great body of the revenue reformers in the Democratic ranks for the purpose of defeating the extreme views and pretensions of the Republican protectionists, who are likely to claim the result of the recent election as being favorable to the policy of protection. Between Republican revenue reformers uniting with Democratic revenue reformers on the one hand, and Democratic protectionists uniting with Republican protectionists on the other, it is probable that changes in the direction of free trade or in the direction of protection will be reduced to a minimum. And hence the ground of our remark that the existing unnatural distribution of political forces between these two parties has at least the advantage of preventing sudden and radical changes in the economical policy of the country, where sudden and radical changes are greatly to be deprecated.

But this negative advantage, great as it is, is also counterbalanced by some very positive disadvantages. A want of definition in the political forces which must needs be combined in order to effect a given object makes their combination difficult, and so tends to prevent the accomplishment of even such changes as may be the most desirable. For instance, if all the Republicans in the next House of Representatives should be like-minded with President Garfield, and with such enlightened Republican Representatives as Mr. Morton, of New York City, it would not be at all difficult to pass a Bill for the suspension of the coinage of the depreciated silver dollar, as well as for the cancellation of the greenbacks as fast as they are received at the Treasury, and to pass such a Bill as a Republican measure. But it is more than probable that, with the opposition of Mr. Kelley and his Republican sympathizers, such a Bill, if passed at all in the House of Representatives, would depend for its passage on the co-operation of the hard-money Democrats, as it would certainly depend on the co-operation of the hard-money Democrats for its passage through the Senate. Thus, the most necessary and desirable changes in the financial policy of the country are compelled to run the gantlet of four parties instead of two—the hard-money Republicans, the hard-money Democrats, the soft-money Republicans and the soft-money Democrats, to say nothing of the Greenbackers, who, happily, are reduced to such a paucity of numbers that they may be practically left out of account in our composition of political forces, unless, indeed, the equilibrium of forces between the Democrats and Republicans should be so evenly poised as to give to the small Greenback fraction a political weight greatly in excess of its numerical force. In this event the unnatural distribution of our political forces would work very disastrously to the prevention of the most expedient legislation. And the same argument, mutatis mutandis, would equally hold good in regard to changes which are required in order to bring our tariff schedules into a greater correspondence with the economic wants of the country and with the principles of public justice.

Another disadvantage resulting from the present mixture of our political forces is that it tends to complicate the problem of government by parties. Where the alignment of parties presents a ragged front it is not easy for the people to perceive the real order of battle, or to hold the different divisions marshaled on the battlefield to their proper measure of responsibility for the result of a political campaign. The sterility of politics—except for purposes of futile contention—in a country torn by factions, finds its explanation in the fact that in the medley and muddle of political opinions no predominant public sense can come to the surface, while, at the same time, no particular party or faction can be held responsible for the failure. Hence, for the purpose of giving clearness to our political discussions, as also for the purpose of giving efficiency and timeliness to needed measures of public policy, it seems to us very desirable that the vacillation and irresolution resulting from the present unnatural distribution of forces between the Republican and the Democratic parties should come to an end, and that new political configurations should bring the constituents of both of these parties into a more definite correspondence with the ideas and policies they are historically supposed to represent. In a word, there is room for a new crystallization which shall give greater internal coherence to the political organization of each, and thereby improve at once the methods and the results of our periodical political agitations.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF CO-OPERATION.

IN spite of all that may be said to the contrary, it may be doubted whether America is prepared for the sort of co-operation advocated by Tom Hughes and others. It certainly seems idle to hope for the development of such institutions upon American soil as the co-operative societies of England, the most successful of which have grown up from the smallest beginnings. The Rochdale Equitable Pioneers started with a capital formed by weekly subscriptions of three pence, and was months in reaching the sum of $140, with which the co-operative store was started. It would be altogether vain to expect of American workingmen the long, consistent course of petty frugality which went to make that capital, and to which, with wise leadership, the Rochdale society owes it that, during thirty-four years, the sales of the business amounted, up to 1878, to about $165,000,000, and the profits divided among the members to nearly $9,000,000.

That co-operation has many advantages to offer there can be no question. Chiefest among them, perhaps, would be one which Mr. Hughes pointed out in his recent address in New York City—the harmony which would be created between employer and employé, by teaching the latter some of the difficulties of the former. Strikes would, of course, be abolished, more thorough work would be done, waste and loss of tools and material done away with when once the laborer had an interest in saving and careful work, and frugality would be promoted by the knowledge that there was a good and safe investment at hand for even the smallest sums.

To these unquestionable advantages co-operation adds a claim to others which are more doubtful. There are at present three functions in industrial society, namely, labor, employer, capital. The first and last are universally conceded to be essential, but it has long been the grievance of labor that the second, which seems less important, absorbs the bulk of the profits of business. The wages of capital, considered by itself, are moderate, and fixed by the same law of supply and demand which governs those of labor; it is capital joined to enterprise—in other words, the entrepreneur, the employer, who receives the enormous profits which excite the jealousy of the laboring class; and it is the beautiful dream of co-operation, by uniting the two functions of labor and employer in one, to secure to the former the enormous gains which now accrue to the latter.

The trouble with this theory is that it doesn't work. Societies of distribution do succeed under associate management, but it is essential to societies of production and of credit, upon which co-operation must depend for investment of surplus capital acquired by the societies of distribution, that they should be managed by a single person, and that a man of uncommon ability and of exceptional training. Thoroughly familiar with the laws which govern trade, wise to discern and bold to embrace opportunity, prophetic in vision, daring in emergency, undaunted in peril, must be the man who, in these days of distant markets and eager competition, would guide a great manufacturing or financial establishment to success. Not to manage such a business well is to manage it very ill: there is scarcely a middle path between great profits and utter loss.

Such a man, it is needless to say, will scarcely be found among the laboring classes, and it is doubtful whether it is possible for any man to bring to the service of others, for wages, those rare and commanding abilities which come only with great personal responsibilities and imminent personal risk. To this difficulty, doubtless, are owing the long list of failures in co-operative enterprise, not only in America, but in England and on the continent of Europe. In spite of the encouraging figures given by Mr. Hughes, co-operation has not worked well on the whole in those countries. It remains to be seen whether he is correct in thinking that the hour has arrived for establishing it in this country upon a new and permanent basis.

THE SOUTH AND THE ELECTION.

THE comments of representative Southern journals on the result of the recent election, as shown by extracts given in another column, are characterized by a moderation of tone at once gratifying and unexpected. While there is a feeling of profound disappointment at the defeat of General Hancock, there is not the slightest disposition to question the result as decisive and final. The dominant feeling seems to be that the party failure is due to the want of a courageous and definite policy acceptable to the great mass of conservative voters, and to the low methods upon which the campaign was conducted by the party leaders—methods which appealed to prejudice and passion rather than to high considerations of principle and to the loftier impulses of the citizen. Quite generally the result is accepted as putting an end to the supremacy of the Bourbon element in the party, and as disintegrating "the Solid South" as a coherent political factor.

Concerning the proposition, started here by a few malcontent party managers, that, on the ground of wholesale frauds, the electoral vote of New York should be thrown out and General Hancock declared elected President by the House of Representatives, not a single public man or respectable newspaper of the South, so far as we have observed, has given it the slightest sanction. To the people of that section, just recovering from the wastes and desolations of civil war, the prospect of anarchy and revolution has no alluring charm. Senator Ben Hill of Georgia expresses what is no doubt the prevailing sentiment of the great body of Southern voters when he says, in a letter just published:

"I see a movement to make an issue on the result in New York, with a view to defeat Garfield in the count by Congress. There would be great danger of this but for one fact, and that one fact is the South will not countenance it. The Republican Party will take the Presidency peaceably because the South wills it, and at the next election the leaders of that party will tell the people from every stump and pulpit in the North that the South must not be trusted! Nevertheless, we shall avert all resolution, not to win Republican praise, or to avoid Republican abuse—for either is impossible—but solely because it is right, and we are determined to preserve the peace of the country."

The feeling of the more intelligent politicians of the South as to the President-elect is also expressed, no doubt, in these words of Senator Hill, quoted from the same letter:

"I really like Garfield. I do sincerely hope he will have a successful administration. He has the ability for the crisis. He must feel keenly the fact that he is elected solely by Northern votes. But he has a great opportunity, and he can—if he will—easily and consistently destroy all sectional animosities and solidities, and be chosen for a second term by a majority of States, North and South. This opportunity is far greater than the office itself, and if utilized will give him a fame which the office could not give and which no previous President attained."

The country may dismiss all fears as to any serious attempt to disturb the electoral count. Such an attempt will not command the approval of any respectable Democrat at the North, and it is already branded at the South with condemnation and contempt. If the dominant party, dismissing all sectional antagonisms, shall use its power wisely, addressing itself to the consideration of practical questions of business policy and reform in administrative methods, we may hope that the issue of the recent contest will prove in the broadest sense a real beneficence, constituting the starting-point of an era of genuine concord and solid prosperity throughout all our borders.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE recent news from abroad is more than usually interesting. In London the banquet at the Guildhall, on Lord Mayor's Day, Nov. 9th, was followed by the speech of Mr. Gladstone, the Premier, who tersely outlined the policy of the Government. He was listened to with great attention, for both home and foreign affairs are in no pleasant position for the tight little island. All the leading diplomatists were present. Mr. Gladstone said that, although the Zulu war was fortunately ended, there was no end to the hostilities at the Cape. The Basutos are in arms, and while the English have inflicted several defeats upon them, still these wild tribes are constantly harassing the colonists, and active steps are being taken to bring the Basutos to subjection. In India, affairs are more quiet, and the hopes of continued peace are so great that it has been found possible to reduce the army there by 30,000 men. In speaking of the Eastern question, Mr. Gladstone said that he had the strongest assurances from the Sultan that everything would be satisfactorily arranged. According to the Prime Minister, the policy of the Liberal Government, far from being opposed to Turkey, is most friendly to that country. It is the policy of the present Cabinet that makes the existence of Turkey possible, for it insists upon the fulfillment of international obligations and a fair treatment of all her subjects, Christian and Mussulman. He was obliged to allow that no progress had been made towards settling the question of the rectification of the Greek frontier. On this subject the English Government is unwilling to act by itself, and has done its best to bring about an amicable conclusion by the aid of the other great Powers. So far as can be learnt from Mr. Gladstone's speech, it is not the intention of the Government to take any active step on behalf of the Hellenes. But the main interest of the Prime Minister's address was to be found in his remarks upon Ireland. He said that the Government was willing to consider the present condition of the laws of Ireland and to make any reasonable alterations that might seem to it advisable. If the happiness of the people demanded any change in the laws, the Government would not scruple to ask Parliament to pass the necessary measures. But there are at the present moment many illegitimate influences at work, and the rights of the people were being interfered with in a most arbitrary manner. This state of things could not be tolerated, and the Government is prepared by strong measures to put an end to the present system of intimidation.

Since this speech of Mr. Gladstone's, a Cabinet Council has been held, and the Irish question thoroughly discussed. It is difficult to see how the Government can get along without the suspension of the habeas corpus Act. Probably if more energetic steps had been taken a few months ago things would never have come to the present dangerous crisis. It would most likely be wiser either to promise certain reforms or else to put down all revolutionary movements with a strong arm. Unfortunately, as it has turned out, the shilly-shally policy of the Liberals has failed in every detail, and the Government is blamed by both landlords and tenants.

The most curious outcome of the present movement is the attempt to relieve the siege which Mr. Boycott, a farmer in the County Mayo, has been subjected to. His laborers have been prevented from cutting his crops, and his social ostracism has been so complete that he has been almost starved out. Stimulated by subscriptions to that end, an armed expedition set out to his relief, and to cut the crops which are still standing. When news of this expedition came to the ears of the Government, it was deemed advisable to send troops to Ballinrobe, Mr. Boycott's place of residence, and thus prevent any outbreak. Infantry and cavalry were consequently dispatched to the scene, and when the Ulster expedition arrived at the railroad station they were met by a strong military escort. The natives, although much excited, and greeting the newcomers with hoots and yells, still were restrained from any open act of aggression. The expedition is lodged on Mr. Boycott's farm and promises to remain, not only to cut and garner his crops, but also to till the ground and sow the seed for those of next year. This case of intimidation is by no means unusual, and the Irish journals are every day full of reports of horrible agrarian outrages.

The difficulties of the English Government are almost rivaled by those of M. Ferry's Cabinet in France, when the Chambers met. A proposition made by the Ministers to discuss the Educational Bill before all other matters was negatived by an overwhelming vote, and M. Jules Ferry and his colleagues sent in their resignation to President Grévy. The course of events which led to this is not difficult to understand. M. Ferry succeeded M. de Freycinet because the latter was unwilling to carry out the "anti-religious communities decrees" in all their harshness, and it was understood that M. Ferry would do so. As soon as he came into power he set all the police machinery throughout the country into play. The religious orders were ruthlessly driven from their homes. The monks protested and claimed their rights as citizens, but it was of no avail. The peasantry saw the men whom they had been brought up to respect treated as so many malefactors. The natural reaction ensued and a general sentimental feeling arose. Many persons in authority resigned their offices rather than carry out the decrees, and the monks were considered to be martyrs suffering in the cause of religion. Meantime, the Ministers saw that it would not do to insist upon the expulsion of the female communities, and they halted in their career. This was the position when the Chambers met. On the one hand, the Right, the Bonapartists, and the Legitimists were arrayed against the Ministry for pressing the decrees as far as they had done. On the other hand, the Extreme and Advanced Left were indignant that the decrees had not been carried out in their entirety. It was the old story, and the Ferry Ministry, between two stools, fell to the ground with a pretty heavy whack. The Ministry resigned, and the President declared his intention of dissolving the Chamber if Gambetta did not agree to form a Ministry. This did not suit the views of the great Tribune, and he put himself to work to arrange for a vote of confidence in Jules Ferry, who was persuaded to withdraw his resignation for the time. Two days afterwards the Chambers again met, and a vote of confidence was passed by an enormous majority. The secret of the situation is to be found in the fact that Gambetta desires to control politics but is unwilling to become premier, knowing full well that any failure he might make in that capacity would irretrievably ruin his chances of in time gaining the Presidency, which is, of course, his great aim. The latest reports indicate that the Ferry Cabinet will soon come to an end, despite the vote of confidence.

OUR COAST DEFENSES.

THE report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, just published, exhibits in a striking manner the utter worthlessness of our sea-coast defenses. In the event of war with a maritime nation, its cruisers and war-vessels could run into our harbors at will, and, without landing a man, could either destroy the property along our shores or lay our cities under contribution. "We have a seacoast line of more than three thousand miles in extent on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, and one thousand miles on the Pacific, not including Alaska, along both of which lie scattered all the great cities, all the depots of commerce, all the establishments of naval construction, outfit and repair, and towns, villages and establishments of private enterprise without number. The accurate detailed charts of our harbors and channels, published by the United States Coast Survey, are accessible to all nations, and are doubtless in their possession. There are foreign military and naval depots and arsenals in close proximity to our shores, and the arrival of armed vessels would follow in a few days or even hours the declaration of war." To meet the assaults of fast-running, sea going armored ships—ships clad with from six to twenty-four inches of iron armor, carrying rifled guns from nine to seventeen-inches bore, which are more powerful than any gun we have in our service—we have only the feeblest armament, while nearly all our existing fortifications are antiquated and incapable of effective resistance. The report of General Wright does not exaggerate the importance of positive and vigorous action looking to the establishment of a through system of defense, and it is to be hoped that Congress will no longer delay the necessary steps in that direction.

THIS is the way the New York Sun puts it: "General Garfield is legally elected. If he lives till March 4th, 1881, he will be inaugurated. Then and thereafter we shall, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that the White House has an occupant who was elected. New York was counted for Hancock before election day, largely on the strength of Mr. Kelly's protestations. Since election day, and on the strength of cold facts, it has been counted for Garfield. It is not likely to be counted for Hancock again at present."

AND now Mr. Richard Grant White, having demolished our public school system, has undertaken to show that "in New York society, as a refining, cultivating, humanizing influence, has ceased to exist." This overthrow of our social culture is due, he argues, to the intrusion of large numbers of "Hibernian gentlemen" who, we are left to suppose, have gone about with their shillelahs on their shoulders, trampling under foot everywhere all obnoxious "humanizing and refining influences." It is evident that Mr. White either sees New York "society" from a very secluded corner, or is so given over to delusions as to be unable to see anything as it really is. It is a clear case for the fool-killer.

HON. WILLIAM B. FRYE, of Maine, is spoken of in connection with the Speakership of the next House of Representatives. Mr. Frye has had a large Congressional experience, is a thorough master of parliamentary law, possesses popular manners joined to great decision of character, and would undoubtedly fill acceptably the position which, in recent times, has been graced by Mr. Blaine and Mr. Randall. There are those, however, who think that his true place is in the Senate, from which Mr. Hamlin will retire with the coming Winter, after a service of over thirty years.

CAPTAIN PAYNE, who has headed two prospecting expeditions into the Indian Territory, has published a "proclamation" giving notice that a third expedition will start at once from Wichita, Kansas, with a view of settling upon the ceded lands of Oklahoma, and inviting all persons desiring to join the enterprise to come prepared with the implements essential to pioneer settlement. As this movement is in violation of law and of the plighted faith of the nation, the Government should see that it is averted, and the participants punished as they deserve, without the least delay.

SECRETARY SHERMAN is understood to have aspirations for the United States Senatorship; but it is not quite sure that the Republican politicians of Ohio will favor his election. He will certainly be antagonized by Governor Foster, who also has Senatorial aspirations; by Stanley Matthews and others, all of whom have active supporters; and as the case now stands, his chances cannot certainly be regarded as particularly flattering. Mr. Sherman has served the country with infinite credit and advantage as the head of the Treasury, and the President-elect could not, perhaps, do better than continue him in that position, thus insuring stability and unity in our financial policy, and escaping the hazards which might follow the application of new theories.

IT is said that the Republicans of the next Congress will adopt a new course of action as to disputed Congressional elections at the South. The plan is to send the election back to the people in every case where violence or any species of fraud can be clearly shown, and to continue thereafter to remand the case for a new election until a perfectly free and fair one has been held. The obvious objection to this plan is that it will practically deprive the disputed districts of representation in the House, and, however desirable it may be to cure disorders of the kind complained of where they actually exist, it is doubtful whether the remedy will be found in the disfranchisement of whole constituencies because of the offense of a few dishonest election officials.

PARTISAN committees are busily at work investigating the alleged election frauds in New York City, with a view of proving that General Garfield's vote was greatly swollen by fraudulent practices. So far, however, the evidence goes to show that the unexpected vote for the Republican candidates was due to a system of wholesale trading by the supporters of the Democratic municipal ticket, and to the fact that hundreds of citizens who have not been in the habit of voting, or have voted with the Democrats, this year cast their ballots for Garfield and Arthur. Doubtless there were irregularities here, as elsewhere, but no one party can be held exclusively responsible for them, and they do not at all account for the large reduction of the Democratic majority in the city and county.

THE expectation seems to be quite general that General Joseph R. Hawley will be elected United States Senator from Connecticut in place of Mr. Eaton. A better selection could not possibly be made. General Hawley is not only a man of high ability but of profound conscientiousness of purpose and stalwart independence of opinion—a man who squares his life by principle rather than by expediency, and who can be relied upon at all times to maintain inflexibly what he believes to be just and right. He is, moreover, a man of affairs, having served with distinguished honor in the House, and been prominently identified with the political movements of the last quarter of a century. His election to the Senate would be a credit to his State, and matter of congratulation to the whole country.

THERE is no reason why the coming session of Congress should not dispose of the question of the next apportionment of Representatives. The Superintendent of the Census will have the correct returns of the enumeration of the population of the United States prepared and ready to transmit to Congress by the 15th of December, and the reapportionment can be made without difficulty if the subject shall be taken up in earnest. Calculating upon the basis of the census returns already known, the New York Times concludes that if the present number of Congressmen remains unchanged the New England States will lose four Representatives and the Middle States six, while the South will gain three and the West seven. New York alone will lose three members, while Texas will gain that number; Pennsylvania will lose two and Ohio one. The gains at the South were not anticipated before the enumeration, but the truth is that many of the Southern States have taken a fresh and vigorous start, and are not only growing in population but increasing in all the elements of substantial business prosperity. Take South Carolina, for instance, which was for a long time a relatively decadent State. Within the last ten years its population has grown at a pace that cannot but excite surprise. From a total of 705,606 in 1870, the number has risen to 995,306 in 1880—an increase at the rate of 41.05 per cent., or considerably larger than the average rate for the whole country is likely to prove.

THE newspapers are already constituting General Garfield's Cabinet. We suspect that he will prefer to be consulted about the matter before announcing his appointments. He has never been in the habit of acting on other people's opinions, and he is not likely now to allow outsiders to choose his official advisers. One idea of the newspapers in this connection is certainly erroneous, if, indeed, it is not ridiculous, and that is that Senator Blaine will not receive any consideration at the hands of the incoming Administration. If there is any man who will be considered by General Garfield it is the Maine Senator between whom and himself the closest personal relations, based on genuine mutual esteem, have existed for years. Mr. Blaine is not likely to have any aspirations for a Cabinet place, but we venture to predict that if anybody shall be consulted as to the general make-up of the new Administration, his counsel will be quite as potent as that of any other public man.

THE organization of the next United States Senate is a subject of grave anxiety to the politicians. Assuming that California will elect a Republican and Tennessee a Democrat, the next Senate will stand thirty-seven Republicans, thirty-seven Democrats and two Independent Democrats—Senator Davis of Illinois and Senator Mahone of Virginia. Judge Davis, however, has invariably voted with the Democrats of late, and has announced himself as a Democrat. Should the Democrats refrain from voting, it will be seen that thirty-eight votes is the highest number, with Senator Mahone's help, that the Republicans can cast, which is one less than a quorum. Senator Grover of Oregon is an invalid, and may not be able to resume his seat, and Senator Lamar's absence from the same cause is also possible. Should Mahone act with the Democrats, of course the organization, with every member present, could be effected without difficulty, but there is a suspicion that he will not be in a hurry to make any alliance which would lose him the control of the patronage of Virginia. If that is assured him by the Republicans, it is not impossible that he may see his way clear to a practical co-operation with that party.

THERE were, possibly, a good many frauds practiced during the recent political canvass, but none was so utterly disgraceful as the forgery and circulation of the alleged Chinese letter of General Garfield. The confessions, last week, of two witnesses called by the supporters of the fraud prove conclusively that the whole thing was a deliberate conspiracy on the part of political trickaters, intent on achieving partisan ends by any means, no matter how disreputable. These witnesses, who had testified that the Morey letter was genuine, being confronted by evidence of the absolute falsity of many of their statements, finally confessed that they had perjured themselves, and implicated at least two prominent Democratic Electors as instigators of the fraud which they had undertaken to carry out. One of these witnesses is shown to have been a member of a gang of robbers who have been operating for several years in Maryland and elsewhere, and both seem to have been the willing instruments of the politicians who hatched the scheme for capturing the votes of workingmen by a forged letter. It seems to be clear that at least one of the witnesses was paid a sum of money by the Democratic National Committee for his services, and if this shall be established as a fact, the persons who paid the money, thereby becoming guilty of subornation of perjury, should be punished to the fullest extent of the law. It would be an outrage on justice to permit a single one of the actors in this plot to escape the penalty which their crime has invoked.

THE New York Times announces that it is proposed by a number of gentleman of both political parties to invite subscriptions to provide a perpetual fund whose annual income shall be enjoyed during life and non-holding of Federal office by the oldest ex-President of the United States. The minimum capital of the fund shall be $250,000, and its probable income not less than $12,500. The Times says:

"Already subscriptions to the amount of $90,000 have been guaranteed, and there is no reason, beyond the desirability of making the movement a popular one, why the whole amount should not be subscribed by twenty-five wealthy citizens of the United States. But it is very obviously desirable that a movement like this should be participated in by the whole people, that the quarter-dollar of the laborer should go to make up the fund as well as the $10,000 of the millionaire. We fully expect to see the aggregate subscription reach $300,000, and we trust that the number of those giving small sums will be no less remarkable than the munificence of those who are able to give large ones.

"It may be necessary to explain that the phrase, 'the oldest living ex-President of the United States,' means the ex-President whose incumbency is most distant in point of time, and that the plan does not, for the present at least, contemplate the enjoyment of a pension by more than one ex-President at a time. The fact that General Grant would, in all probability, be the first beneficiary of the contemplated trust does not, in the least, make it a movement in his special interest."

This movement should commend itself to the support of all classes in the community. In nearly every other country some adequate provision is made for men who have served the State conspicuously, and we have only too long constituted an exception to this proper rule. By all means, let us put ourselves right before the world in this particular as soon as possible.

IMMIGRANTS AT CASTLE GARDEN.

THE WORK OF THE STATE COMMISSIONERS.

I CROSSED the Battery Park upon a glorious, sunshiny morning of last week, and passing through a dense crowd of comfortably clad, clean, healthy and thrifty looking immigrants, speaking all the tongues that ever wagged at Babel, penetrated the precincts of Castle Garden. A very courteous official met me in the Rotunda, and, having informed him that I desired to see Mr. Henry J. Jackson, the Superintendent of the Commissioners of Emigration for the State of New York, I was shown up an iron staircase and through a large desk-laden office into a bright, cheery, oblong apartment, known as the Board Room, where I encountered the official of whom I was in quest—a bright-eyed, florid-faced, merry-looking gentleman, half way in the thirties.

"Here's more of it!" laughed Mr. Jackson, handing me an open letter. "Just read that; for, in addition to all my other duties, it would appear that I am a matrimonial agent." The letter ran:

"November 12*th*.

"MR. JACKSON—I take the liberty to write to you to ask you to do me a kindness by giving me the address of some Western gentleman, as I would like to send my address to some one who is of good moral character—a dark-complexioned man preferred. By sending my address to such a man would add to the happiness of my life: and please oblige a lonely girl who wishes to secure a husband.

"Address: MISS ROSALIND SWEETMAN,
"Henby, Pa."

"Bless you," said Mr. Jackson, "since ever a letter addressed to me from a German immigrant wanting a wife was published in the Herald, I have been besieged by letters from men and women. Look at this pile!" he exclaimed, flinging a great tied bundle of missives upon the table; "and this is only a fragmentary portion of what I receive."

After glancing over the contents of some of these letters, which were as quaint as they were straightforward and amusing, Mr. Jackson resumed:

"This year has proved the largest emigration year for a quarter of a century, and the class of immigrants is exceptionally good, the German element especially so, and indeed I can say the same for the Irish. Mr. Davitt, the Irish agitator, to whom I spoke the other day in reference to the cleanly and comfortable appearance of the Irish emigrants now arriving, laughingly remarked, 'Maybe it's because they have forgotten to pay the rent.' We have had as many as 8,000 emigrants to house in that Rotunda this season, while all our licensed boarding-houses were crammed to the uttermost limits of their capacity. This is our Board Room. The Board of Emigration Commissioners meets here and hold investigations."

"What is the nature of these investigations?" I asked.

"Principally inquiries into the want of civility of subordinate officers on board the steamers, and the quantity and quality of the food furnished."

The walls of the Board Room are adorned with rare old prints of Castle Garden and the Battery. One of these dates from the visit of Jenny Lind, and the name of the gifted cantatrice appears in large letters over the entrance to the Garden.

A very fine portrait of Governor Cornell occupies one wall, while photos of some of the ragged, homeless girls taken from the street-scrapings of Liverpool by Father Nugent, and brought out to Minnesota last year, teach a wondrous lesson, since in little less than a twelvemonth these girls, from being literally hatless and shoeless, are now gorgeously arrayed in those fallals so dear to the feminine heart, and earning from $10 to $12 per month.

"The routine of Castle Garden may be briefly summarized," observed Mr. Jackson. "After examination of their luggage on shipboard by the Customs officers, the immigrants are transferred to this landing depot, where they are received by the officers of the Commission, who enter in registers kept for the purpose all necessary particulars for their future identification. The names of such as have money, letters or friends awaiting them are called out, and they are put into immediate possession of the property, or committed to their friends, whose credentials have first been properly scrutinized. Such as desire can find clerks at hand to write letters for them in any European language, and a telegraph-operator within the depot to forward dispatches. Here, also, the main trunk lines of railway have offices, and while the immigrant can buy tickets and have his baggage weighed and checked, brokers are admitted under restrictions which make fraud impossible to exchange the foreign coin or paper of immigrants. A restaurant supplies them with plain food at moderate prices; a physician is in attendance for the sick: a temporary hospital ready to receive them until they can be conveyed to Ward's Island, where we have our chief hospital and its efficient and numerous staff. Those in search of employment are furnished it at the labor bureau connected with the establishment. Such as desire to start at once for their destination are sent to the railway or steamboat; while any who may choose to remain in the city are referred to boarding-house keepers admitted to the depot, whose charges are regulated under special license, and whose houses are kept under constant and rigid supervision by the Commission."

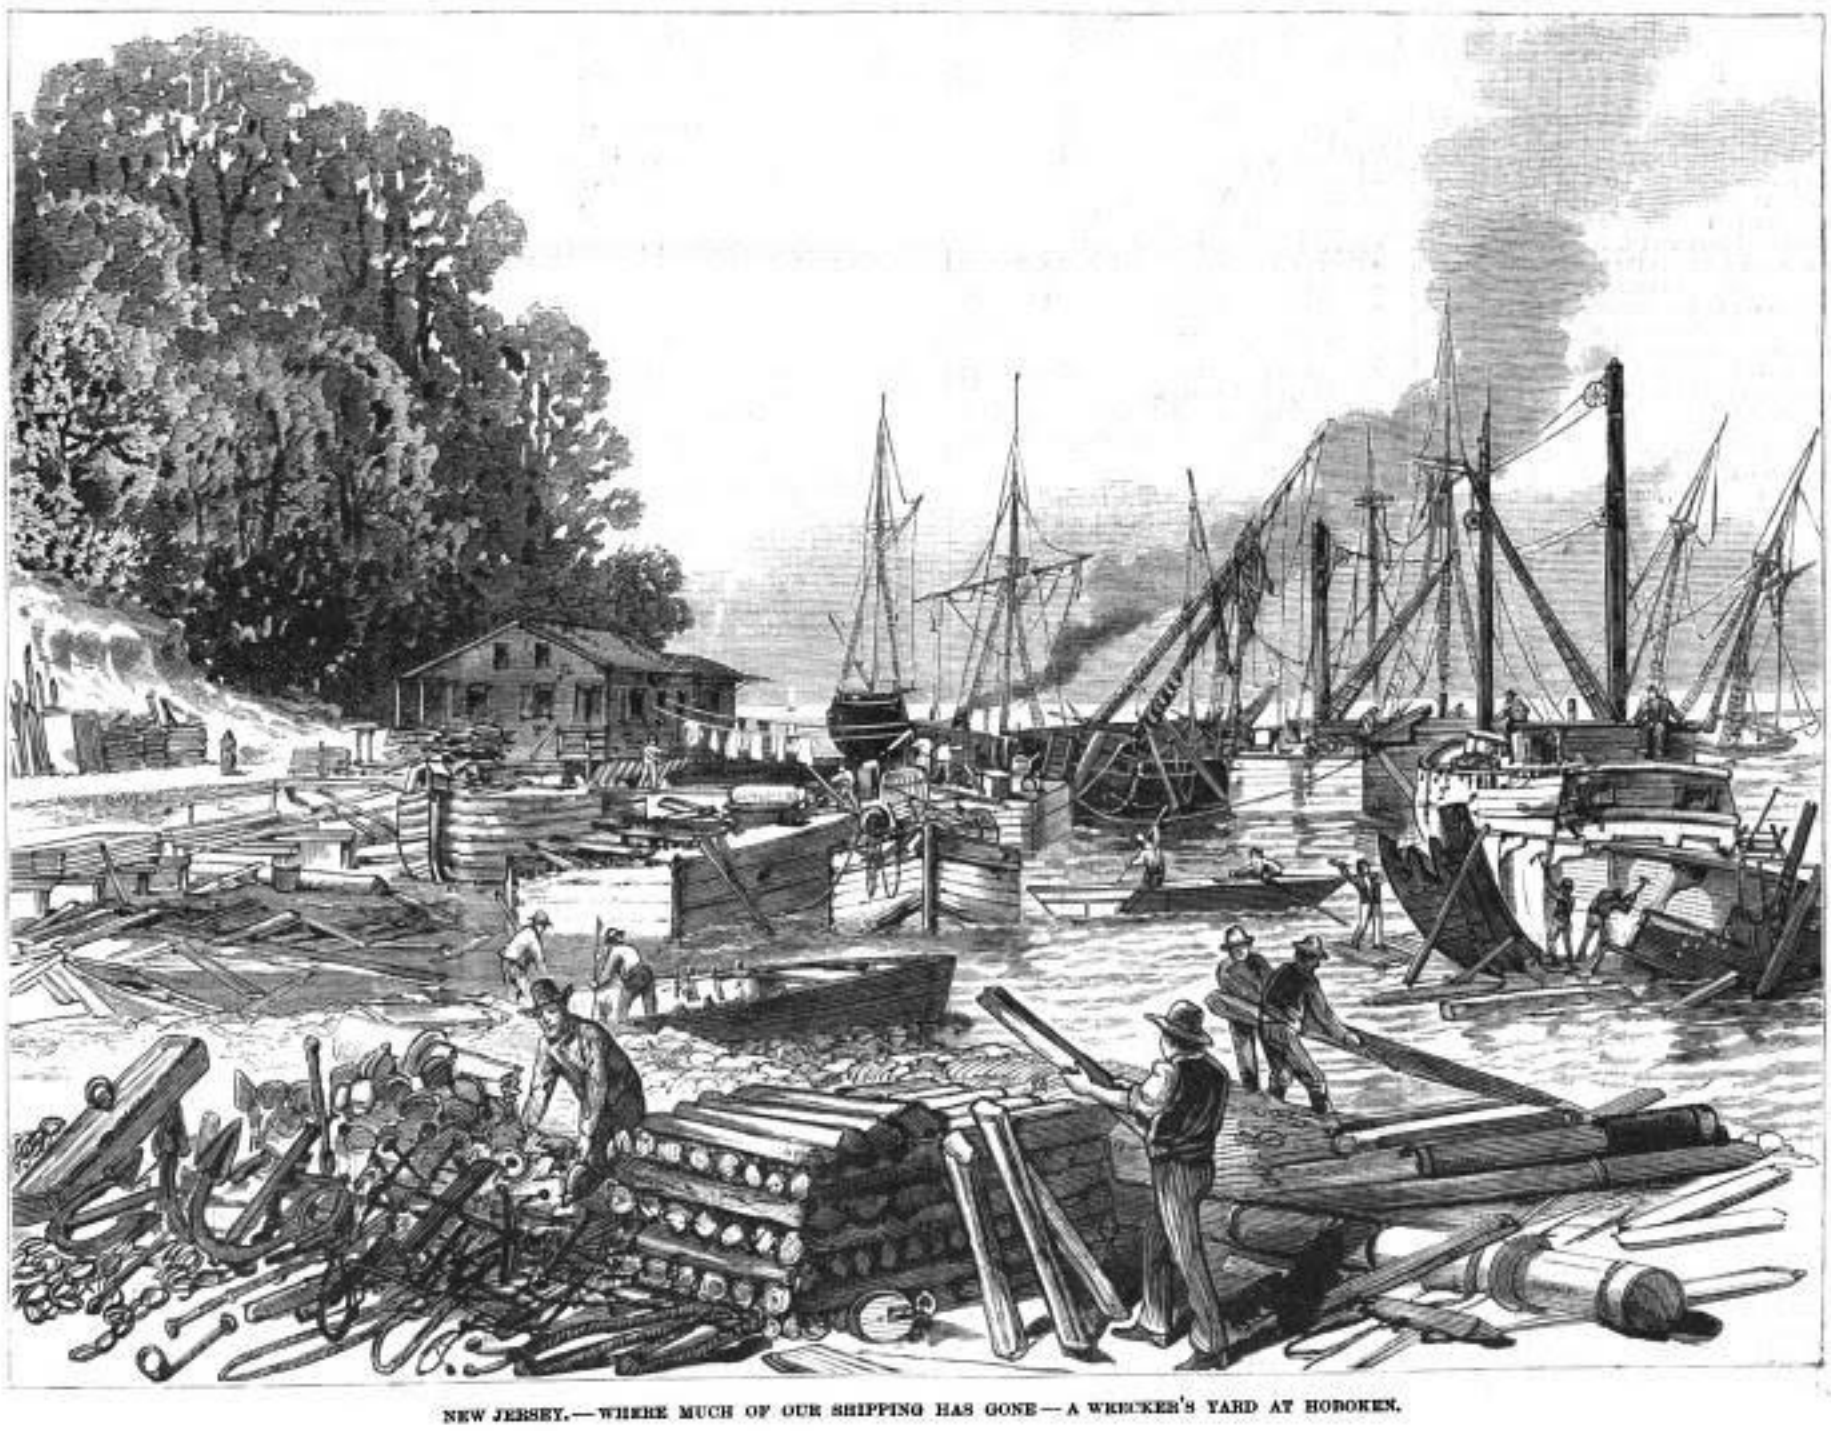
"Are these services rendered gratuitously, Mr. Jackson?"

"Yes, sir. Without any fee or charge whatever to the immigrant."

At this moment some Suabian and Irish immigrants, who had just arrived, demanded a hearing, having a series of alleged grievances to bring before the Board. In a twinkling they were admitted, and as I quitted the Board Room the Irishman was engaged in stating his case with all the rhetoric for which his nation is so justly famous.

HENRY J. JACKSON, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE BUREAU OF EMIGRATION, CASTLE GARDEN.

WHERE AMERICAN SHIPPING HAS GONE.



DURING the late campaign, political speakers made all possible capital out of the decline of American shipping. Audiences, more or less large, all over the country, were told how free trade and protection had driven the American merchantmen from the seas; how this kingdom and that empire had grown fat upon the profits of ocean freighters that in equity belonged to this country, and how Congressmen and everybody else were responsible for this deplorable condition of affairs. They asked, What has become of American shipping? And they answered, It has gone, it has disappeared. They directed the eye of the masses to Maine and inquired, Why are the shipyards closed? Why does not the merry ring of the hammer resound upon the ribs of oak as of yore? Then they said something about foreign competition and cheap labor, and got their hearers delightfully entangled amid "bottoms" and "registers" and "tonnage." Still none of the orators of the people indicated just where the shipping had gone. They acknowledged that there had been such things as American whalers and merchantmen, and, while claiming that they had gone, declined to say where or how.

Now, while the candidate and the orator were thus entertaining the enlightened masses, posing national conundrums to them but never vouchsafing the solution, we quietly undertook to discover the answer. And now that everybody has been elected who could be, and no one's chances can be in the least affected by our disclosures, we take pleasure in making known where a good portion of the great American shipping has gone. Not to the bottom, not to the skies, not burned by English rivals, not stealthily acquired by Russian agents. No, gentlemen of the national assemblies, and you of the political platform, you must look nearer home. Go at your leisure to Hoboken, and right beneath your nose you will find the solution to the enigma that has exercised statesmen for fifteen years. There is where our shipping has gone, decrepid with age and long service, veterans of the seas and gales. And there let them be disintegrated, that in their last employments they may still prove of practical utility to the masses, without fear of the bugbears of free trade and protection.

AFTER THE NAVAL REVIEW.

AFTER various postponements, the official review of the vessels belonging to the North Atlantic fleet, consisting of seven cruising and four training ships, began at Fortress Monroe on November 10th. On the day previous the Tennessee gave a reception and dance, which was largely attended by visitors and the ladies of the squadron there and of the garrison.

Immediately after the adjournment of the Cabinet meeting on the 9th all the members present, excepting Secretary Sherman, took carriages at the Executive Mansion and drove to the wharf, where they boarded the United States steamer Dispatch and proceeded to Hampton Roads. Mrs. Hayes and her daughter, Miss Fanny Hayes, occupied the President's carriage, and President Hayes, Mr. Webb Hayes and Secretary Thompson occupied the carriage of the latter. The United States steamer Tallapoosa left in the afternoon for Hampton Roads with the heads of bureaus of the Navy Department and other Government officials on board.

On the arrival of the Dispatch and Tallapoosa at the Roads on Monday morning, a Presidential salute of twenty-one guns was fired from the flag ship Tennessee, her yards being manned, as were those of the other ships of the fleet, while a torpedo salute was fired in shoal water along the beach by the officers and crew of the Tuskarora. Each successive torpedo as it exploded threw up a lofty column of spray, which in descending formed a beautiful rainbow.

At ten o'clock the commanding officers of the eleven ships to be reviewed went over in their gigs to be presented to the President and Cabinet officers upon the Dispatch. The commanding officers who paid their respects were Captains Luce of the Minnesota, Braine of the Pawnee, Harmony of the Tennessee, Stanton of the Constellation, and Meade of the Vandalia; Commanders Yates of the Alliance, O'Kane of the Guard, Picking of the Kearsarge, Miller of the Yantic, Evans of the Saratoga, and Crowninshield of the Portsmouth. The Minnesota, the Constellation, the Saratoga and the Portsmouth are the training-ships for boys. The first has 291 of these apprentices, the second 167, the third 121, the fourth 124. To display the progress of these young sailors, and to demonstrate the efficiency of this training system in securing American crews for American ships of war, is a prime object of this system of naval reviews.

The exercises ordered for the occasion were as follows:

First—Inspection, clearing ship for action, general quarters, target practice with great guns, abandoning ship, fire quarters.

Second—Exercises of sails, boat exercise and torpedo practice.

Third—Landing for review, infantry, artillery and hospital service.

Fourth—Making sail and getting under way.

It was expected that the President would be honored with a grand display of fireworks from the fleet, but the rain prevented. The ball, however, took place, and was as brilliant as all naval balls are.

Having given detailed illustrations of the manœuvres at the review last year, which were on the same general plan, we now report pictorially an incident that occurred in the evening, showing the method of collecting the straggling sailors who had been granted short leave, and exceeded both their time and their disciplinary instructions.

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

CHAPTER VIII.—THE PRIEST OR THE WOMAN?

LORD LORING hurried away to his dressing-room. "I won't be more than ten minutes," he said, and left Romayne and Stella together.

She was attired with her customary love of simplicity. White lace was the only ornament on her dress of delicate silvery gray. Her magnificent hair was left to plead its own merits, without adornment of any sort. Even the brooch which fastened her lace pelerine was of plain gold only. Conscious that she was showing her beauty to the greatest advantage in the eyes of a man of taste, she betrayed a little of the embarrassment which Romayne had already noticed at the moment when she gave him her hand. They were alone; and it was the first time she had seen him in evening dress.

It may be that women have no positive appreciation of what is beautiful in form and color, or it may be that they have no opinions of their own when the laws of fashion have spoken. This at least is certain, that not one of them in a thousand sees anything objectionable in the gloomy and hideous evening costume of a gentleman in the nineteenth century. A handsome man is, to their eyes, more seductive than ever in the contemptible black coat and the stiff white cravat which he wears in common with the servant who waits on him at table. After a stolen glance at Romayne, Stella lost all confidence in herself—she began turning over the photographs on the table.

The momentary silence which followed their first greeting became intolerable to her. Rather than let it continue, she impulsively confessed the uppermost idea in her mind when she entered the room.

"I thought I heard my name when I came in," she said. "Were you and Lord Loring speaking of me?"

Romayne owned without hesitation that they had been speaking of her.

She smiled, and turned over another photograph. But when did sun pictures ever act as a restraint on a woman's curiosity? The words passed her lips in spite of her. "I suppose I mustn't ask what you were saying?"

It was impossible to answer this plainly without entering into explanations from which Romayne shrank. He hesitated.

She turned over another photograph.

"I understand," she said. "You were talking of my faults." She paused, and stole another look at him. "I will try to correct my faults if you will tell me what they are."

Romayne felt that he had no alternative but to tell the truth—under certain reserves. "Indeed, you are wrong," he said. "We were talking of the influence of a tone, or a look, on a sensitive person."

"The influence on me?" she asked.

"No. The influence which you might exercise on another person."

She knew perfectly well that he was speaking of himself. But she was determined to feel the pleasure of making him own it.

"If I have any such influence as you describe," she began, "I hope it is for good?"

"Certainly for good."

"You speak positively, Mr. Romayne. Almost as positively—only that can scarcely be—as if you were speaking from experience."

He might still have evaded a direct reply, if she had been content with merely saying this. But she looked at him while she spoke. He answered the look.

"Shall I own that you are right?" he said. "I was thinking of my own experience yesterday."

She returns to the photographs. "It sounds impossible," she resumed softly. There was a pause. "Was it anything I said?" she asked.

"No. It was only when you looked at me. But for that look, I don't think I should have been here to day."

She shut up the photographs on a sudden, and drew her chair a little away from him.

"I hope," she said, "you have not so poor an opinion of me as to think I like to be flattered?"

Romayne answered with an earnestness that instantly satisfied her.

"I should think it an act of insolence to flatter you," he said. "If you knew the true reason why I hesitated to accept Lady Loring's invitation—if I could own to you the new hope for myself that has brought me here—you would feel, as I feel, that I have been only speaking the truth. I daren't say yet that I owe you a debt of gratitude for such a little thing as a look. I must wait till time puts certain strange fancies of mine to the proof."

"Fancies about me. Mr. Romayne?"

Before he could answer, the dinner bell rang. Lord and Lady Loring entered the library together.

The dinner having pursued its appointed course (always excepting the case of the omelette), the head servant who had waited at table was graciously invited to rest, after his labors, in the housekeeper's room. Having additionally conciliated him by means of a glass of rare liqueur, Miss Notman, still feeling her grievance as acutely as ever, ventured to inquire, in the first place, if the gentlefolks upstairs had enjoyed their dinner. So far, the report was, on the whole, favorable. But the conversation was described as occasionally flagging. The burden of the talk had been mainly borne by my lord and my lady, Mr. Romayne and Miss Eyrecourt contributing but little to the social enjoyment of the evening. Receiving this information without much appearance of interest, the housekeeper put another question, to which, judging by her manner, she attached a certain importance. She wished to know if the oyster-omelette, accompanying the cheese, had been received as a welcome dish, and treated with a just recognition of its merits. The answer to this was decidedly in the negative. Mr. Romayne and Miss Eyrecourt had declined to taste it. My lord had tried it, and had left it on his plate. My lady alone had really eaten her share of the misplaced dish. Having stated this apparently trivial circumstance, the head servant was surprised by the effect which it produced on the housekeeper. She leaned back in her chair and closed her eyes, with an appearance of unutterable enjoyment. That night there was one supremely happy woman in London. And her name was Miss Notman.

Ascending from the housekeeper's room to the drawing room, it is to be further reported that music was tried, as a means of getting through the time, in the absence of general conversation.

Lady Loring sat down at the piano and played as admirably as usual. At the other end of the room Romayne and Stella sat together, listening to the music. Lord Loring, walking backwards and forwards with a restlessness which was far from being characteristic of him in his after-dinner hours, was stopped when he reached the neighborhood of the piano by a private signal from his wife.

"What are you walking about for?" Lady Loring asked, in a whisper, without interrupting her musical performance.

"I'm not quite easy, my dear."

"Turn over the music. Indigestion?"

"Good heavens, Adelaide, what a question."

"Well, what is it, then?"

Lord Loring looked towards Stella and her companion.

"They don't seem to get on together as well as I had hoped," he said.

"I should think not—when you are walking about and disturbing them! Sit down there behind me."

"What am I to do?"

"Am I not playing? Listen to me."

"My dear, I don't understand modern German music."

"Then read the evening paper."

The evening paper had its attractions. Lord Loring took his wife's advice.

Left entirely by themselves, at the other end of the room, Romayne and Stella justified Lady Loring's belief in the result of reducing her husband to a state of repose. Stella ventured to speak first, in a discreet undertone.

"Do you pass most of your evenings alone, Mr. Romayne?"

"Not quite alone. I have the company of my books."

"Are your books the companions that you like best?"

"I have been true to those companions, Miss Eyrecourt, for many years. If the doctors are to be believed, my books have not treated me very well in return. They have broken down my health, and have made me, I am afraid, a very unsocial man." He seemed about to say more, and suddenly checked the impulse. "Why am I talking of myself?" he resumed, with a smile. "I never do it at other times. Is this another result of your influence over me?"

He put the question with an assumed gayety. Stella made no effort, on her side, to answer him in the same tone.

"I almost wish I really had some influence over you," she said, gravely and sadly.

"Why?"

"I should try to induce you to shut up your books, and choose some living companion who might restore you to your happier self."

"It is already done," said Romayne; "I have a new companion in Mr. Penrose."

"Penrose?" she repeated. "He is the friend, is he not, of the priest here, whom they call Father Benwell?"

"Yes."

"I don't like Father Benwell."

"Is that a reason for disliking Mr. Penrose?"

"Yes," she said, boldly, "because he is Father Benwell's friend."

"Indeed, you are mistaken, Miss Eyrecourt. Mr. Penrose only entered yesterday on his duties as my secretary, and I have already had reason to think highly of him. Many men after that experience of me," he added, speaking more to himself than to her, "might have asked me to find another secretary."

Stella heard those last words and looked at him in astonishment. "Were you angry with Mr. Penrose?" she asked, innocently. "Is it possible that you would speak harshly to any person in your employment?"

Romayne smiled. "It was not what I said," he answered. "I am subject to attacks—to sudden attacks of illness. I am sorry I alarmed Mr. Penrose by letting him see me under those circumstances."

She looked at him, hesitated, and looked away again. "Would you be angry with me if I confessed something?" she said, timidly.

"It is impossible I can be angry with you!"

"Mr. Romayne, I think I have seen what your secretary saw. I know how you suffer, and how patiently you bear it."

"You!" he exclaimed.

"I saw you with your friend, when you came on board the steamboat at Boulogne. Oh, no, you never noticed me! You never knew how I pitied you. And afterwards, when you moved away by yourself, and stood by the place in which the engines work—you are sure you won't think the worse of me if I tell you?"

"No, no!"

"Your face frightened me—I can't describe it—I went to your friend, and took it on myself to say that you wanted him. It was an impulse—I meant well."

"I am sure you meant well." As he spoke, his face darkened a little, betraying a momentary feeling of distrust. Had she put indiscreet questions to his traveling companion, and had the major, under the persuasive influence of her beauty, been weak enough to answer them. "Did you speak to my friend?" he asked.

"Only when I told him that he had better go to you. And I think I said afterwards I was afraid you were very ill. We were in the confusion of arriving at Folkestone—and, even if I had thought it right to say more, there was no opportunity."

Romayne felt ashamed of the suspicion by which he had wronged her. "You have a generous nature," he said, earnestly. "Among the few people whom I know, how many would feel the interest in me that you felt?"

"Don't say that, Mr. Romayne! You could have had no kinder friend than the gentleman who took care of you on your journey. Is he with you now in London?"

"No."

"I am sorry to hear it. You ought to have some devoted friend always near you."

She spoke very earnestly. Romayne shrank, with a strange shyness, from letting her see how her sympathy affected him. He answered lightly.

"You go almost as far as my good friend there reading the newspaper," he said. "Lord Loring doesn't scruple to tell me that I ought to marry. I know he speaks with a sincere interest in my welfare. He little thinks how he distresses me."

"Why should he distress you?"

"He reminds me—live as long as I may—that I must live alone. Can I ask a woman to share such a dreary life as mine? It would be selfish, it would be cruel; I should deservedly pay the penalty of allowing my wife to sacrifice herself. The time would come when she would repent having married me."

Stella rose. Her eyes rested on him, with a look of gentle remonstrance.

"I think you scarcely do women justice," she said, softly. "Perhaps some day a woman may induce you to change your opinion." She crossed the room to the piano. "You must be tired of playing, Adelaide," she said, putting her hand caressingly on Lady Loring's shoulder.

"Will you sing, Stella?"

She sighed and turned away. "Not to-night," she answered.

Romayne took his leave rather hurriedly. He seemed to be out of spirits and eager to get away. Lord Loring accompanied his guest to the door.

"You look sad and careworn," he said. "Do you regret having left your books to pass an evening with us?"

Romayne looked up absently, and answered, "I don't know yet."

Returning to report this extraordinary reply to his wife and Stella, Lord Loring found the drawing-room empty. Eager for a little private conversation, the two ladies had gone upstairs.

"Well," said Lady Loring, as they sat together over the fire, "what did he say?"

Stella only repeated what he had said before she rose and left him.

"What is there in Mr. Romayne's life," she asked, "which made him say that he would be selfish and cruel if he expected a woman to marry him? It must be something more than mere illness. If he had committed a crime, he could not have spoken more strongly. Do you know what it is?"

Lady Loring looked uneasy.

"I promised my husband to keep it a secret from everybody," she said.

"It is nothing degrading, Adelaide; I am sure of that."

"And you are right, my dear. I can understand that he has surprised and disappointed you: but, if you know his motives——" she stopped, and looked earnestly at Stella. "They say," she went on, "the love that lasts longest is the love of slowest growth. This feeling of yours for Romayne is of sudden growth. Are you very sure that your whole heart is given to a man—the best, the noblest of men—but still a man of whom you know little?"

"I know that I love him," said Stella, simply.

"Even though he doesn't seem, as yet, to love you?" Lady Loring asked.

"All the more because he doesn't. I should be ashamed to make the confession to any one but you. It is useless to say any more. Good-night."

Lady Loring allowed her to get as far as the door, and then suddenly called her back. Stella returned unwillingly and wearily. "My head aches and my heart aches," she said. "Let me go away to my bed."

"I don't like you to go away, wronging Romayne, perhaps, in your thoughts," said Lady Loring. "And, more than that, for the sake of your own happiness, you ought to judge for yourself if this devoted love of yours may ever hope to win its reward. It is time, and more than time, that you should decide whether it is good for you to see Romayne again. Are you strong enough to do that?"

"Yes, if I am convinced that it ought to be done."

"Nothing would make me so happy," Lady Loring resumed, "as to know that you were, one day, my dear, to be his wife. But I am not a prudent person—I can never look as you can, to consequences. You won't betray me, Stella? If I am doing wrong in telling a secret which has been trusted to me, it is my fondness for you that misleads me. Sit down again. You shall know what the misery of Romayne's life really is."

With those words, she told the terrible story of the duel, and of all that had followed it.

"It is for you to say," she concluded, "whether Romayne is right. Can any woman hope to release him from the torment that he suffers, with nothing to help her but love? Determine for yourself."

Stella answered instantly:

"I determine to be his wife!"

With the same pure enthusiasm, Penrose had declared that he, too, devoted himself to the deliverance of Romayne. The loving woman was not more resolved to give her whole life to him than the fanatical man was resolved to convert him. On the same common battle-ground the two were now to meet in unconscious antagonism. Would the priest or the woman win the day?

CHAPTER IX.—THE PUBLIC AND THE PICTURES.

ON the memorable Monday when the picture-gallery was opened to the public for the first time, Lord Loring and Father Benwell met in the library.

"Judging by the number of carriages already at the door," said Father Benwell, "your lordship's kindness is largely appreciated by lovers of art."

"All the tickets were disposed of in three hours," Lord Loring answered. "Everybody (the librarian told me) is eager to see the pictures. Have you looked in yet?"

"Not yet. I thought I would get on first with my work here."

"I have just come from the gallery," Lord Loring continued. "And here I am driven out of it again by the remarks of some of the visitors. You know my beautiful copies of Raphael's Cupid and Psyche designs? The general impression, especially among the ladies, is that they are disgusting and indecent. That was enough for me. If you happen to meet Lady Loring and Stella, kindly tell them that I have gone to the club."

"Do the ladies propose paying a visit to the gallery?"

"Of course—to see the people! I have recommended them to wait until they are ready to go out for their drive. In their indoor costume, they might become the objects of general observation as the ladies of the house. I shall be anxious to hear, Father, if you can discover the civilizing influences of art among my guests in the gallery. Good morning."

Father Benwell rang the bell when Lord Loring had left him.

"Do the ladies drive out to-day at their usual hour?" he inquired, when the servant appeared. The man answered in the affirmative. The carriage was ordered for three o'clock.

At half-past two Father Benwell slipped quietly into the gallery. He posted himself midway between the library-door and the grand entrance, on the watch, not for the civilizing influences of art, but for the appearance of Lady Loring and Stella. He was still of opinion that Stella's "frivolous" mother might be turned into a source of valuable information on the subject of her daughter's earlier life. The first step towards attaining this object was to discover Mrs. Eyrecourt's present address. Stella would certainly know it, and Father Benwell felt a just confidence in his capacity to make the young lady serviceable, in this respect, to the pecuniary interests of the Church.

After an interval of a quarter of an hour, Lady Loring and Stella entered the gallery by the library-door. Father Benwell at once advanced to pay his respects.

For some little time he discreetly refrained from making any attempt to lead the conversation to the topic that he had in view. He was too well acquainted with the insatiable interest of women in looking at other women to force himself into notice. The ladies made their remarks on the pretensions to beauty and to taste in dress among the throng of visitors, and Father Benwell waited by them and listened with the resignation of a modest young man. Patience, like virtue, is sometimes its own reward. Two gentlemen, evidently interested in the pictures, approached the priest. He drew back, with his ready politeness, to let them see the picture before which he happened to be standing. The movement disturbed Stella. She turned sharply—noticed one of the gentlemen, the taller of the two—became deadly pale, and instantly quitted the gallery. Lady Loring, looking where Stella had looked, frowned angrily, and followed Miss Eyrecourt into the library. Wise Father Benwell let them go, and concentrated his attention on the person who had been the object of this startling recognition.

Unquestionably a gentleman, with light hair and complexion; with a bright, benevolent face and keen intelligent blue eyes—apparently still in the prime of life. Such was Father Benwell's first impression of the stranger. He had evidently seen Miss Eyrecourt at the moment when she first noticed him; and he, too, showed signs of serious agitation. His face flushed deeply, and his eyes expressed, not merely surprise, but distress. He turned to his friend.

"This place is hot," he said; "let us get out of it!"

"My dear Winterfield!" the friend remonstrated, "we haven't seen half the pictures yet."

"Excuse me if I leave you," the other replied. "I am used to the free air of the country. Let us meet again this evening. Come and dine with me. The same address as usual—Derwent's Hotel."

With those words he hurried out, making his way, without ceremony, through the crowd in the picture-gallery.

Father Benwell returned to the library. It was quite needless to trouble himself further about Mrs. Eyrecourt or her address.

"Thanks to Lord Loring's picture-gallery," he thought, "I have found the man!"

He took up his pen, and made a little memorandum—"Winterfield, Derwent's Hotel."

Rural Improvement in New England.

ALMOST every New England village of much prosperity now has its Society for Promoting Rural Improvement, the work of which is to induce and direct tasteful architecture and gardening. Bishop Clark of Rhode Island, in a Ledger article, emphasizes the value of these societies by describing Fortbridge in 1859 and in 1880. This is Fortbridge as it was: "The houses bordering the main street are all inclosed by rail-fences, picket-fences, and dilapidated stone walls, with creaky turnstiles and gates half-unhinged, and drunken posts leaning against an old stump for support; patches of unshorn grass and weedy gravel, fagots of bark and wood and brush, fragments of ancient carts, and broken plows and disabled harrows, heaps of mortar and stones, piles of bottles, and all other conceivable forms of rubbish, dumped into the gutter. The barns and sheds and dwelling houses are all much of the same pattern and the same color, if they can be said to have any color at all; cold, bare, dreary, with no piazzas, or porches, or window hoods, or any other attempt at ornamentation." This is Fortbridge as it is now: "Most of the old houses reappear, but with broad piazzas, tasteful porches, and bay-windows peeping out from the vines and flowers; with altered roofs and fancy chimneys, and rich coloring. The ugly fences are gone, flowers bloom in front of all the houses, the streets are all reformed, the weeds and rubbish are seen there no more. Good, clean sidewalks have been laid from one end of the village to the other, and the roadway is so fine and smooth that even Mr. Bonner would not hesitate to drive the marvelous Sarus, or any other of his swift-footed steeds, through the town at any pace of which they might be capable. The barren common has been converted into a park, the duck-ponds into romantic lakes, with a swan or two sailing about."

English Railroad Progress.

A REPORT just issued by the Board of Trade shows the development of the railway system in Great Britain during the past decade, in spite of the depression of the past few years. The broad facts are an increase of mileage between 1869 and 1879 from 15,343 to 17,696 miles, or about 17 per cent.; an increase of capital from £538,779,000 to £717,033,000, or about 38 per cent.; an increase of gross receipts from £42,696,000 to £61,776,000, or 45 per cent., the increase of receipts from railway traffic proper, excluding "miscellaneous," being from £41,071,000 to £59,366,000, or 44½ per cent.; an increase from £20,780,000 to £32,045,000, or 54 per cent. in the total working expenditure, the increase in the railway working expenditure only, exclusive of certain miscellaneous items, being from about £20,263,000 to £31,051,000, or 53 per cent; and an increase of total net receipts from £21,916,000 to about £29,731,000, or 36 per cent., and of the net receipts from railway working only from £20,813,000 to £28,345,000, or also 36 per cent.; the proportion of the former to the whole capital falling from 4.22 to 4.15, and of the latter from 4.01 to 3.95. It appears on the face of these facts that the increase of mileage is much less than the increase of capital, which would imply, making all allowance for the nominal increase of capital by conversion operations, a constant expenditure of capital on lines open for traffic; but as the same time that the increase of receipts is much greater than the increase of capital, being no less than 45 per cent., as compared with an increase of 38 per cent. only in the capital. The final result is, that in spite of this large increase of capital, and also of the still larger proportionate increase of working expenditure, amounting to 54 per cent., the return per cent. on the increased capital is just about as great in 1879 as the return on the smaller capital in 1869. Railway shareholders are, on the average, no worse on the face of the figures than they were in 1869, while the figures themselves, allowing for the increase of nominal capital only, and for the circumstance of trade having begun to revive from a previous depression in 1868, while 1879 was the lowest point of the depression, may be held to denote a real improvement.

MORGANATIC marriages are brought again prominently to the attention of the reading world through the reported alliance of the Czar of Russia and the Princess Dolgorouki. There have been no fewer than fifteen of these "irregular" marriages contracted by Princes of the royal houses of Europe, previous to the Czar's free-and-easy nuptials. The following is the list: The Archduke Henry of Austria, to Fraulein Leopoldine Hoffman, now entitled Frau von Waldeck; Prince Charles of Baden to Baroness Rosalie Louise von Beust; Prince Louis, Duke of Bavaria, to Fraulein Henriette Mentho, who now bears the title of Baroness von Wallersee. Prince Louise de Bourbon was married at New York to Mlle. Marie Hamel, who is now entitled Princess de Bourbon. Prince Alexander of Hesse Darmstadt to the Countess Julia von Haucke, daughter of the late Count Haucke, formerly Minister of War in Poland. She was first created Countess of Battenburg, and in 1858 was raised by her brother-in-law, the Grand Duke Louis III., to the dignity of princess, a title which is also borne by her children. Prince Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenberg to Fraulein Carmelite Eisenblatt, daughter of a merchant in Venezuela. The Prince has received from the German Emperor the title of Count von Noer for himself and his descendants. The King of Italy, whose first wife died in 1855, was remarried a few years ago to the Countess Rosina de Mirafiori, whose family name is not stated. Prince Elimar of Oldenburg contracted a morganatic alliance at the end of last year, the particulars of which are wanting. His cousin, Prince Nicholas, was married to the widow of Count von Doubett, who has received the title of Countess von Merenberg. King Ferdinand of Portugal, whose wife, Queen Maria da Gloria, died in 1853, was morganatically married to Mlle. Elise Hensler, who has been created Countess Edla. Prince Edward, of Saxe Weimer to Lady Augusta Gordon-Lennox, a sister of the present Duke of Richmond and Gordon, who has been created Countess von Dornberg. His brother, Prince Gustavus of Saxe-Weimer, married Mlle. Pierma Marochia, who has been created Countess von Neuberg. George Duke of Saxe-Meiningen married Fraulein Ellen Franz, now entitled Baroness von Heldburg. Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg-Gotha, brother of King Ferdinand of Portugal, married Fraulein Constantine Adelaide Thereza Gerger, who now has the title of Baroness von Rutzenstein. Prince Albert, of Waldeck-Pyrmont, married Miss Dora Gage, a daughter of the late Rev. Robert Gage. She has since been created Countess von Rhoden. It will be seen that fourteen of these fifteen princes belong to the reigning houses in Germany and Austria. In four cases their wives were formerly actresses.

OUR NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

GROWING oranges in the lower counties of Mississippi for market purposes is assuming large proportions, and now bids fair to become the leading industry in that portion of the State. True, the soil is not very fertile, but there are other advantages, such as proximity to market, cheap transportation, both by rail and water, society, schools, churches and other adjuncts to civilization, which more than counterbalance the poverty of the soil.

IT is calculated that Dakota and Minnesota will, in all probability, produce one-tenth of the wheat grown in the United States this season, figuring the whole amount at 420,000,000 bushels, the probable yield.

THE values of the main crops of the United States are as follows: Corn, $525,000,000; beef, $270,000,000; wheat, $410,000,000; cotton, $327,000,000; rye, about $18,000,000; oats, $150,000,000; barley, $20,000,000; buckwheat, $2,000,000; hay, $300,000,000, and pork, $260,000,000.

FROM observations taken during visits to manufacturing centres in New England for three, almost four, months, the Boston Journal of Commerce concludes that "it is apparent that the manufacturers of New England suffer less this year than ever before in the diminution of business in a year of the Presidential canvass. In most departments of manufacturing, the season just passed has been a good one; in some respects greatly prosperous. There has been no time since the war when there was so great a demand for equipping tools and machinery—for the necessaries to establish manufacturing. These demands are not for a class of goods that are merely offered on the general market, but for goods which are themselves reproducers and make the materials and the articles demanded by a purchasing public. The order-books of most of our first-class manufacturing establishments are filled with demands for tools, appliances and means of manufacturing; while all our directly producing concerns are driven to fill orders for goods ready for consumption."

A PROMINENT miller of Minneapolis states that the mills of that city will grind 16,000,000 to 18,000,000 bushels of wheat during this cereal year, and Minnesota mills outside the city will grind as much more.

NORTH CAROLINA has sixty-four cotton mills, ten new ones having been added within a year, making a total for that State of 118,758 spindles.

SOME English capitalists own 500,000 acres of land in Alabama, on the line of the Alabama Great Southern Railroad, which are very rich in timber and minerals and which they intend developing. For the present chief attention will be given to developing the mineral resources of these lands, which are almost boundless, but the farming interests will not be neglected. Arrangements are now making to induce immigration of English farmers, and as an early day a number will probably settle on the lands.

THE Commissioner of Emigration of Florida thinks that 15,000 people have emigrated to that State within two years.

NEARLY 1,000 houses have been erected at Denver, Col., during the year, and yet rents and real estate are high, and many families are unable to find houses at any price. A Board of Trade has just been organized.

OVER one million bales of cotton were marketed during the month of October. The receipts at all ports were 960,000, and if the overland movement be no greater than for the same month last year, something like $50,000,000 worth of the staple left plantations during the second month of the season. These figures are far in excess of any previous record. When the movement to the ports last October reached 884,000 bales, the figures were in excess of the previous season by nearly 200,000 bales, and now these are again overtopped by 76,000.

DURING the season of 1879-80 there were 119,583,000 tons of commercial fertilizers inspected in the State of Georgia. This was an increase of 34,334 tons over the previous year. Of these, 104,838 tons were ammoniated phosphates and 13,906 tons were acid phosphates.

THE drive of Texas cattle to Kansas this season, from the most authentic data that can be procured, is 350,764. In addition to this number, from 30,000 to 40,000 head have been driven to the neighborhood of Caldwell and Hunnewell, Kansas. Altogether, the total drive is estimated to be, in round numbers, about 400,000.

CHATTANOOGA has the largest nunnery now to be found in the United States, worked entirely by black labor, many of these blacks being those who have "exoded" from other sections.

THE Swiss colony in North Carolina has discovered that the mulberry-tree grows with as much luxuriance as the cherry, and that the soil and climate of that State alike foretell the future production of silk under the best conditions.

THE Bluegrass section of Kentucky is ten thousand square miles in area. There is double the area in that one patch of land than there is in all the land now cultivated in wheat in all Great Britain, and nearly every acre of it capable of producing a wheat crop, without the use of a particle of manure, equal to the average production of the most highly cultivated wheat land in Great Britain. The secret is that the rotten limestone that underlies the soil keeps disintegrating, and furnishes a constant supply of the elements of plant growth. An occasional plowing and turning under of clover or buckwheat is all the fertilizing needed.

THE oyster business of Virginia amounts to $2,000,000 yearly. There 6,538 white and 7,298 colored men engaged in it.

THE New York trade in honey is increasing yearly, and the western part of this State furnishes a large supply. White clover honey is considered the best. California furnishes the finest American honey, as it also furnishes a larger quantity than any other part of the world. Large tracts of land are covered with a dense growth of white clover for the bees. A considerable amount of wild honey comes from Virginia. Honey in the original comb is preferred by many persons, as there is a greater certainty of getting it pure than when it is bought already strained.

THE Northern Pacific railroad is running from Duluth, Minnesota, to Tacoma, Dakota, and now have 864 miles in operation. Work is being pushed rapidly west of Tacoma, and the line will be 1,947 miles in extent when completed to the Pacific coast.

FIFTEEN new school-houses have been completed in Montague County, Texas, within the last six months.

THE Pensacola branch of the Louisville and Nashville road received and forwarded 120,000 sacks of guano last year. This year they expect to forward 220,000 sacks. The resident manager of the above road is making Pensacola an important cotton shipping port.

THE elevator capacity of Baltimore is about 8,000,000 bushels. The receipts of grain during the present season have been so large that there has been constant fear of a blockade, but heretofore, owing to the abundance of tonnage offering and the rapidity of shipments, there has been no obstruction. For some time past, however, the receipts have greatly exceeded shipments, and the elevator capacity having been exhausted, a perfect blockade exists. The total carrying capacity of all grain-vessels in port last week was a million bushels less than the stock in the elevators, and there were upwards of 1,500 grain cars lying on the tracks, unable to unload. At Locust Point, the terminal station of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, every possible means was employed to relieve the glut. The new coffee and tobacco warehouses were utilized for grain storage, and barges were loaded, simply for storage purposes.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Visit of the Prince of Montenegro to the Allied Fleet.

Shortly after the arrival of the last vessel of the International squadron at Gravosa, the hereditary Prince of Montenegro, Danilo-Alexandre, came from his mountain home to pay his respects to the nations through their naval representatives. In the steam-yacht of the British admiral he passed across the line of the grim ironclads, and received a royal salute. After making the tour of the roadstead occupied by the ships, the Prince visited each of the admirals, and was honored on touching the decks with the ceremonies due a sovereign. He was elegantly attired, and his suite, in the splendid costumes of the country, presented quite a brilliant spectacle.

Garibaldi at Genoa.

When General Garibaldi landed at Genoa, on his way to Milan to participate in the exercises commemorative of the battle of Mentana in 1867, where he encountered both the Papal and the French troops, he was so feeble that he had to be carried from the boat to the hotel. There were thousands of admirers ready to do him this service. His reception in Milan was extremely enthusiastic, so much so that it completely overcame him, and his physical condition has since been very precarious. The celebration occurred on November 24.

Water Fete at Dusseldorf.

In September last, an exhibition of arts and manufactures was held in Dusseldorf. The members of the Iron and Steel Institute attended in force, and during their stay a water fête was promoted for their edification. The scene which we reproduce is from this entertainment. A bridal party in the Middle Ages is returning from the church, when it is attacked by pirates; the bride is borne away; there is a combat and gluttonously a rescue, and the castle—the freebooters' lair—is destroyed by fire. Those who saw the entertainment describe it as both realistic and picturesque.

The Emperor of Austria's Tour in Galicia.

The tour which the Emperor of Austria made recently through his Galician dominions was in every respect most successful, he being everywhere received with the utmost enthusiasm. Our present illustration represents the inhabitants of the district of Cracow escorting the royal carriage into the town of that name. The Cracovians, who are great horse-riders as well as dealers, accompanied the Emperor on horseback, exhibiting at the same time their skill in the saddle and their entire control over their half-tamed animals. After witnessing the army manœuvres and sham fight near Sadowa Wisnia, the Emperor left Krynovice, where he had been staying, and proceeded to Lemberg, where, on his arrival, there was much enthusiasm, speech-making, singing, firing of guns, and a torchlight procession of 5,000 persons being among the manifestations of joy. But it is unnecessary to detail the progress of His Majesty. Suffice it that the visit has had the effect of raising the loyalty of the population, and drawing them nearer to the throne.

Algiers and the Djerba.

The capital of the French province or colony of Algeria is built on the face of a pretty steep hill, the houses rising above each other, so that there is scarcely one of them which does not command a view of the sea. The city consequently has from the sea a very imposing appearance, as the houses are all white, and look like a succession of terraces; but on entering the illusion vanishes, and many of the thoroughfares are found to be filthy, dark and crooked, although much has been done by the French to enlarge the streets. The islands whence Algiers derives its name are two rocky ledges, which have been united, strongly fortified, and connected with the mainland by a mole. Another mole stretches from these islands, and incloses the harbor, which is rather small. A lighthouse is erected on one of the islands, at the junction of the moles. The modern Djerba is the ancient island Meninx, rendered famous by Homer as the island of the Lotos Eaters. Near the anchorage of Mont-es-Sook existed not many years ago a remarkable pyramid twenty feet high and ten feet broad at the base, composed entirely of human skulls, reposing in regular rows on intervening layers of bones belonging to the bodies. They are supposed to have been the remains of Spanish soldiers who landed here under the Duke of Alva in 1560, and were defeated and slain by the Moors. This curious, but barbarous, monument was removed by the Bey of Tunis at the request of the European Consuls, and a column in the French cemetery marks the spot where the bones were interred.

The Queen and Prince in the Highlands.

The favorite Summer and Autumn residence of Queen Victoria is at Balmoral, Aberdeenshire, Scotland. It was here that, she says, she spent the happiest portion of her life, that portion which was terminated by the death of the Prince Consort. Together they climbed the hills, and grew rapturous as lovers over the grandeur of the scenery. To-day she goes over the same courses, visits the same lochs and cairns, and, beside the charming Loch Callater, sits herself to muse and sketch as she did years ago. While Her Majesty has thus found rest and quiet from state affairs, the Prince of Wales has also revelled in the Highlands, but in a robuster manner. As guest of Colonel Farquharson and of the Earl of Fife, he has passed several days at Invercauld and Mar Lodge, indulging in the hunt to his heart's content, participating fully in the customs of Highland life, and rendering himself, as usual, immensely popular.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A BERLIN dispatch announces that 3,000 Jews have left Roumania for America by the way of Bremen.

—RESIGNATIONS of French magistrates on account of the enforcement of the religious decrees are announced daily.

—THE Liverpool emigration returns for October show that 14,000 persons left the Mersey during the month, principally for the United States and British America.

—THE railway between Baku and Tiflis, Russia, will be opened early in the Spring, and American, German and Russian merchants are already competing for the borax in the Baku petroleum district.

—SAN FRANCISCO telegrams announce that the Chinese are leaving that port for home in large numbers. Nearly 600 left in the steamer of the 4th, and passage has been engaged for an equal number in the steamer that is to follow.

—THE British Post-office authorities have organized a new system for savings banks, issuing forms for holding twelve postage-stamps which will be received as deposits for one shilling. The system went into effect all over the country on Monday last.

—BY the will of Edward M. Barringer, an American, who was killed by the upsetting of a diligence in Switzerland on August 20th, a fund of $3,000 was left to Vassar College, and over $25,000 will be devoted to the establishment of scholarships at Harvard.

—THE College for Working-women in London is thoroughly successful. It aims to provide for women who are occupied during the day a higher education than is ordinarily within their reach. Cookery is taught therein as well as the intellectual branches.

—THE people of Kansas have not lost the bristling Puritanic spirit which possessed them from their beginning. They have adopted the constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquors in the State, by an estimated majority of 20,000.

—THE expelled French monks are flocking to Madrid. Nobles are offering them their palaces, town councils are giving them old convents and vacant buildings, the King is granting them interviews and the Ministry is authorizing the Jesuits and other Orders to establish themselves in Madrid and all over the kingdom.

—PRINCE BISMARCK has sent a commission to Alsace to study the condition of the workmen there, especially with regard to their dwellings, which are somewhat on the English cottage principle, every man living in his own house. This system seems to be in favor with the Chancellor, who wishes it to be introduced all over Germany by Government help.

—AN earthquake was felt on November 9th throughout Southern Austria, from Vienna to the Adriatic and the frontiers of Bosnia. At Agram, in Croatia, the shock was so violent that every house in the town was injured. Several persons were killed and thirty were injured. Many buildings will have to be pulled down, as they are unsafe. A large number of the inhabitants fled to the fields.

—A DISPATCH from St. Petersburg says: "At the trial before the military tribunal all the Nihilist prisoners acknowledged belonging to the revolutionary party. One named Shevaroff admitted that he participated in the preparation of the mine under the railway at Moscow, in December, 1879, and two others recounted the proceedings in connection with the mine on the Simferopol Railway."

—THE Mormon Temple commenced at Salt Lake City twenty years ago is not yet finished. They are still working at it. Already over $4,000,000 have been expended, and the structure has scarcely assumed shape. It is estimated that its total cost will exceed $28,000,000. The contract has yet sixty years to run. It is to be built of Utah granite, and will be the finest building in the United States.

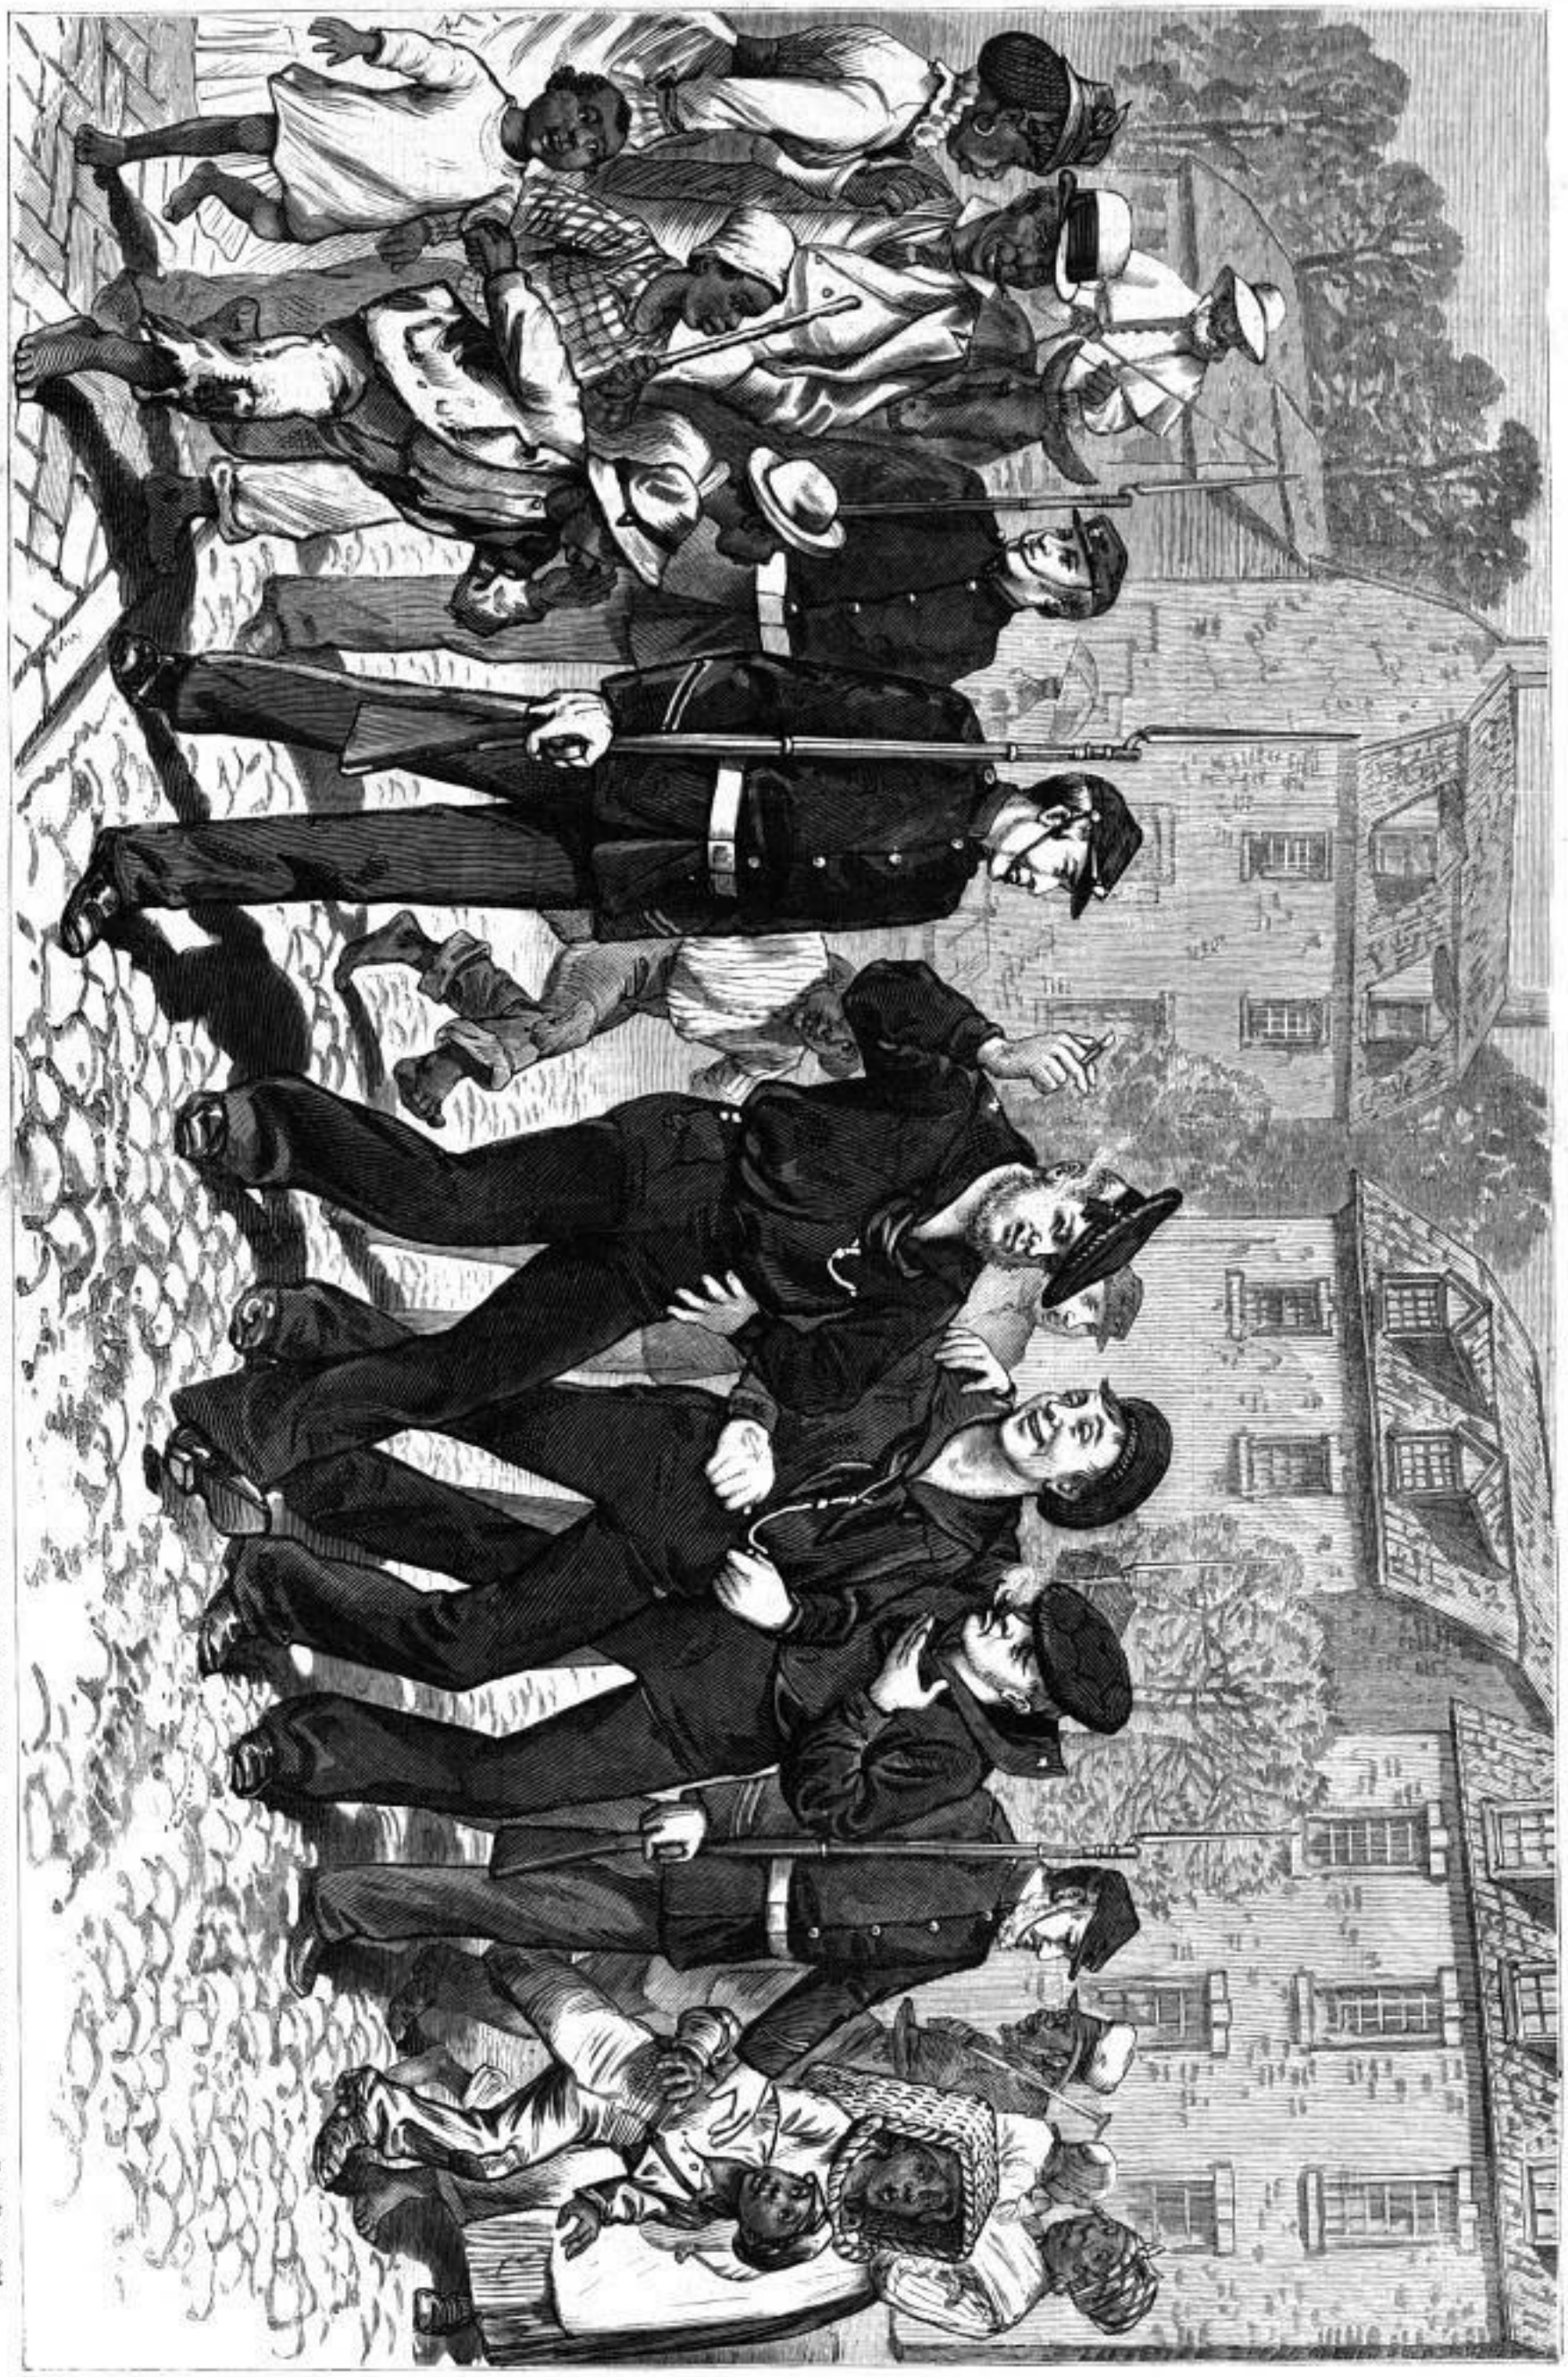
—THE report of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30th shows that the actual cost of the Postal Service during this period was only $2,786,341. This deficit is $240,114 less than the deficit of the preceding year, which was uncommonly small, the deficit for the fiscal year 1878 having been upwards of $4,000,000. The total revenues of the Post-office Department during the last fiscal year were $33,215,479, and the total expenditures $36,101,820.

—THE November report of the secretary of the Brooklyn Bridge Trustees states that up to October 30th, 1880, the total receipts for carrying on the mammoth undertaking were $12,538,677.61; the total expenditures, $12,466,894.31. Of this last sum there has been paid for land, land damages and buildings, in securing the right of way, $3,743,804.88; for engineering services, $469,923.75; for labor, $1,999,684.22; for printing and advertising, $12,142.36; for granite, $2,639,315.40; for cast-steel cable wire, $923,733.10.

—THE Franco-American Mixed Commission, to settle the claims of the French citizens against the United States and of citizens of the United States against France, respectively, growing out of losses in the Rebellion and the contests in France, met at the State Department, Washington, November 6th. As soon as the counsel for the United States is selected the Commissioners will begin the examination of claims. Under the treaty all the cases must be disposed of within two years from the organization of the Commission.

—ON the 31st of October the mountain stronghold of the Bantu Chief, Molotsane, was successfully stormed by Colonel Clarke's forces. During this operation 5,000 Basutos attacked the colonial detachment holding Chief Lerothodi's village, and before reinforcements could arrive a small body of them were surrounded on all sides, and five were killed. The enemy advanced in great numbers, compelling the colonials to retreat in an orderly manner and relinquish their position. The Zombus are now in open rebellion, and reinforcements are being sent to all important points.

—M. DE LALONDE, the French agricultural delegate, at present in Ottawa, Canada, has had an interview with Sir John McDonald, relative to the setting apart of 150,000 acres of land in the Northwest for French settlers from Alsace and Lorraine. He is acting on behalf of a company of French capitalists who have this colonization scheme in view. He is also to report to the French Government on the resources of the Northwest. He reports that wheat can be grown in the Northwest at a cost of five francs per 200 pounds, whereas it costs twenty-two francs to produce the same quantity in France.



—IN Roumelia the rose harvest is reported to have been an exceedingly abundant one this year, the value of the total yield exceeding, it is estimated, 1,000,000 francs. The richest harvest of late years, however, was in 1876, when 2,300 pounds of attar-of-roses, of the value of 932,017 francs, was exported from Philippopolis alone. The attar is principally exported to France, Austria, America and Germany, England obtaining what she requires from India. The French scent manufacturers, and especially the Parisian, buy the finest qualities of attar, while the second qualities are mostly sent to Russia and Austria.

A MOOD.

I CRIED, "No heart is true!
The sky has lost its sun;
The earth is cold and desolate;
I would that life were done!"

A hand was clasped in mine.
Two hearts for ever one!
Now earth and sky in beauty shine;
My life has just begun.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER LII.—"IT IS LOVE."

TWO months have passed—eventful months for our heroine—and upon which we touch lightly for fear of wearying the reader. In that time all that she has lost in social position and distinction have been more than regained. As soon as she in a degree recovered her composure, she wrote to the Emperor informing him of her presence in Russia, and, with that diplomacy of nobles jealous of their distinction, it was instantly resolved to guard from the public the fact of the young lady's escape, and to merely announce that the delegates dispatched for that purpose had returned from Siberia with her. This was done to avoid any unnecessary excitement, and succeeded.

Maize has taken up her abode in a quiet but elegant hotel, for the liquidation of which expense she has borrowed a portion of the wealth placed at her disposal by Count Smoloff, and in the hands of the abbot—borrowed it until she can decide upon some plan for her future support. Here, at her hotel apartments, she has been honored by a visit in person from the Czar himself, which has been followed by every noble and noted dignitary of the city. Yet, despite all this homage and adulation, despite this readiness of the titled world to reinstate her as its queen, she feels strangely alone in this new existence. Her mind goes back continually to the past. In these days she feels Jack's loss with a poignancy that has never before touched her and as she sits by the window this particular morning, looking down in the street, a feeling of loneliness is heavy upon her. Suddenly she is roused from her meditations by a step. She looks up. In the doorway stands a grand and massive figure, with a dark, cameo-like face that she knows so well. He stands there mute, motionless, his eloquent eyes filled with that mighty pagan worship that has well-nigh wrecked his life—for which he stood ready to brand himself a murderer and a suicide. He looks at her in that piteous, beseeching, eloquent stare of a dumb brute—this woman whom he feels he has injured beyond all hope of reparation, and as he sees the golden shining of the stately head, the steady lustre of the wondrous eyes, the matchless grandeur of the Grecian face, all the shame, the agony, the injustice of the past sweep before his vision, and where he stands in his stricken manhood, his prostrate pride, a great dry sob breaks chokingly in his throat. For a short time past, under the encouragement of the abbot, between whom and himself is a free and perfect understanding, he has dared to hope that for him the future may yet hold some happiness. Yet now, as he stands before the woman of his persecution, who has been dragged down to the very slums of degradation, who has stood before a public clamoring for her blood, he sees how vain and desperate is such a hope.

He knows that to this firm, delicate, lofty nature he must be like one accursed—he who in her hour of woe turned traitor to his love—he who could hold her guilty while yet the stamp of her high purity was upon her brow. All through his haughty life he has been as iron, but of what avail are pride, will, dominance here? They cannot save him from the curse of his faithlessness. His strength is broken, his head sinks upon his breast, he stands before her in the shame and agony and humiliation that never touched her, branded with her degradation. He is conquered. That haughty dominance of a lifetime that sought even in her childhood to bend under its iron dominion the strength and pride of her will, now bends to that will, now yields to it the glory of the victor! Through martyrdom and sacrifice he has striven to atone, yet, confronted by his victim how little, how worthless appears that atonement!

Yet he has loved her—loved her, he believes, as mortal man never loved woman before. And all the agony of that sweet, delirious love—all the impotent regret of the past—sweep upon him in this moment like an avalanche, and, staggering into the chamber, he sinks in a chair beside a little mahogany table, and, flinging his arms upon it, he buries his face upon them, while great sobs shake his form from head to foot. The old proud power is gone—that thirst for dominion over her vanished. He lies there, shielding his face from the loveliness that can never more be his, and cursed with the knowledge that his own hand has dashed the cup of happiness from his famished lips.

The girl stands motionless for a moment; then slowly she draws near to the suffering man, a hot, changing flush upon her dazzling face, and where he lies in his intolerable anguish he feels a touch upon his arm light as a snow flake. She feels him shudder throughout his massive form, as her hand rests upon him, but he lifts his haggard, hopeless face and looks at her as she stands beside him, reared in the fullness of her stature, in the haughty loveliness of her youth.

"Oh it was cruel—cruel!" he mutters.

"What was cruel?" Her soft, tremulous voice completes his madness. He flings her hand from him, and, leaping to his feet, commences pacing back and forth with rapid strides.

"It was cruel to send me here with a lie." His voice is fierce and suppressed. "Cruel to rouse hopes but to dash one back in despair! The abbot told me such a strange, wild story, and, in my weakened condition, I was mad enough to listen. I know that my presence is an insult—that I have no right to raise my eyes to you. Yet——" His hands clinch, and his face looks dark and worn with its suffering.

She stands by the little table, one soft, white hand resting upon it, and her eyes cast down.

"But what did the abbot tell you?" she murmurs.

"He told me—— But what is the use of repeating such madness," he says, roughly. "He told me a lie, though he might have believed it himself."

"I think he told you the truth," she says, lowly. Is the man blind that he cannot read the soft flush over that beautiful face, the tender drooping of the haughty mouth? He stops short and looks at her—a wild, agonized, wondering glance. And then she raises her eyes. In the next moment he is by her side; and again that hoarse, broken reproach breaks from his white lips:

"Oh, it is cruel—cruel! Are you all in league against me?"

She lifts her head and looks up at him; in her eyes the glad, radiant triumph of love, as all hesitation vanishes.

"If the abbot told you that I loved you better in your fallen might than in the proudest hour of your strength, he told you right."

It is a moment ere the full import of her words strike him, then his arms close convulsively around her, and she is folded closely to his breast, while he bends his imperial head upon her face, and she feels the great, salt, bitter tears as they drop from his weary eyes. The past vanishes; the memory of festering pain dies out; that bitter strife of a lifetime is lain down; the dead years with their wreck and ruin lie buried for ever!

At last he holds her gently from him, and looks at her, always in that humble, piteous, agonized regard that is inestimably touching in one of his haughty temperament, which in the past has been as unyielding as iron—he looks at her, this woman in the morning of her matchless loveliness, who could draw sovereigns to her feet by the title of that wondrous splendor, who could have younger, perhaps handsomer, lovers; yet she loves him—him, with his wreck and ruin, with his youth buried in the ambition of dead years!

He crushes her to him in fierce passion and wild with his rapture, while he caresses her throat, her lips, her eyes and the gold of her burnished hair.

"And you love me—me!" he mutters. "Oh, my God! it is more than I deserve!"

Her bare arms reach up and twine around the brown column of his haughty throat, her face, wet with her tears, presses close to his.

"You are sure," he urges, deliriously, "that it is love? It is not pity? It is your love that I want! Oh, my God! I have yearned for you, hungered for you, so in the past!"

And she answers him, steadily:

"It is love!"

"And you will be my wife—you will let me send for a priest and be married immediately? If you love me you will not, you cannot refuse!"

She looks up at him with a fond smile.

"I have no desire to refuse. I will be married at any time."

"But if in the future you should see younger men whom you should grow to love more dearly"—his breath comes sharply, and he crushes her to him with unconscious violence—"it would kill me. It would be kinder of you to shoot me!"

Where she lies in his arms she throws far back her lovely head and looks at him, in her eyes a world of passionate pain and reproach.

"Never while this remains," she says, lowly, puttin: up her hand and softly touching the deep wound in his temple, which though healed can never be effaced, "shall I cease to love you. You are my lover—my king." And he knows that he has her love for all eternity.

And at the same time, away off in that frozen land of shame and bondage, a calm, still face is upturned to the clear, white light of the young day—a face sunken and hollow, but stamped with the majesty of death, and a grand and fearless courage. The light from the east falls upon the whitened hair, the closed eyes, the sharp, clear cut features, the hardened hands resting from their toil.

The radiance of the moon grows brighter and brighter. From the noxious brakes, with their stagnant waters, comes the shrill call of the cicada: past that still figure awaiting such time as there may be opportunity to inter it, file the exiles to labor at a fresh mine. But nothing now has power to disturb that deep and dreamless repose. The weary, bitter struggle of life is over—the shackles are rent asunder—the burden thrown down, and at the feet of Christ the tired soul has laid down its woes.

A week later, when through the influence of the powerful Minister Toboskie and his lovely wife the royal pardon comes for Count Smoloff, it is too late. The exiled noble has been emancipated by a mightier hand than even the Czar of Russia, and at the footstool of the King of Heaven he has sat down.

CHAPTER LIII.—THE FINALE.

AND what more remains to be told? Through the changing scenes of Maize's life we have followed her until her old identity is lost, and the star of the Countess Toboskie is risen in its full and eternal splendor. Knowing no will save hers in all his life, it was the count's desire to go far away from the country which had so nearly been their downfall. But with a gentle yet firm resolution his wife refused this plan; though she had fallen, she had also risen. And even as she loved her husband for his intrinsic worth, she was also proud of his political eminence, of the world-wide fame of his distinction. Therefore, she would not wrench from him his sceptre of power while yet his years were at their richest. Eminence has crowded upon fame; in all the country the name of Toboskie is held up as synonymous with power, wealth and distinction. The greed of power, the mailed pride of ambition, they are all gratified; but aside from the patrician splendor, the haughty fame of his brilliant career, there is something still holier and better—it is the love of thousands who have never seen his face, and yet to whose hearts his name is dear as a friend and sympathizer. Under the anguish of the past, under that great and almost fatal error that he made, he has learned to temper judgment with mercy, and to know that even the haughty strength of his glorious intellect may err in its decisions. When he steps into the streets shouts of welcome greet him, for it is well known that he is a friend to the helpless and a merciful judge to the guilty. And as he is known through the land, so has also the fame of the loveliness and accomplishments of his wife spread abroad. She is courted in foreign courts, and the bright particular star of the high bred and titled throng of her adopted land.

Thrice idolized by her husband, her life is sheltered in by the purest, the most devoted love that ever falls to the lot of woman. She is the gay, glad, triumphant queen of the Russian court, yet her richest kingdom is in her husband's heart. In her hands the iron will that never was touched is bent like a reed—the pride that never yet stooped to mortal man knows no existence. And thus, with the future bright and undimmed, we leave them.

And as their days go on in the splendor of their triumphs, up in the monastery on the mountains the abbot leads his simple, grand, stately life, his soul far removed from all turmoil of earth, his spirit communing. With the royal generosity of his nature, Toboskie eagerly pressed to share his great fortune with his brother, and used every endeavor to bring him forth into the world he was so well fitted to adorn. But this the abbot kindly but firmly refused. He had ate of the fruit of the world, and it had been dead-sea apples; he had drunk of the fount of fame, and it had been wormwood and gall. For him life had held its snare and its great bitterness, and his nature, purified and alienated from carnal weaknesses, was happy up here with its God! And thus, in these extremities, far from one another as the North Pole from the South, do the brothers pursue their careers.

Of Lady Chetewood there is little to be told. That gay, insouciant, reckless nature is still her blessing or her curse. She is the idol of her husband, the pet of the high bred English circles, to which, by right of her beauty—she seems gifted with perpetual youth—and her husband's titles, she belongs. She and the Countess Toboskie sustain a regular correspondence, but to the latter has come no idea of that great, dark past. The cherishing love of her husband has kept from her the knowledge that would surely have crushed her. She will never know that she is the offspring of shame—that it is to that weak and erring woman she owes her existence. Neither has Valentine's and Gypsy's complicity with the murder of Count Lagors ever come to her knowledge. That great brain, stimulated by its idolatry, has explained all mysteries to her satisfaction, and the past is buried so deep that it can never again touch her.

Peter has long since been gathered to his fathers, and with him we believe our Russian characters end, and we have only one final little romance to chronicle before we write the "finis." Among the deputies of nobles that the Czar sent to Siberia was Count Erkenstein. As a matter of course, the hospitality of Count Zickwoff's mansion was extended to the royal representatives, and the heart of this hot headed young Count went entirely into the keeping of the beautiful Lady Jet, who was then depressed with the failure of her attempt to rescue the count and his death, which was the final blow. But he sought and obtained permission to correspond with her, and, after a year of this intercourse, and another visit from the persevering young noble, the heart of the little peeress succumbed to a second love, which, if it lacked the ideality and romance of the first, was not the less strong and true.

She is now the Countess Erkenstein, and one of the stars of the social firmament, while Phedora is her cherished companion. But upon the life of the gay little countess is a shadow that can never be wholly lifted, and which fell when she discovered the death of her playfellow and childish companion—Nick. He had descended the shaft once too often, and that night after Count Smoloff had been re-throned by the secretary's wife, and chained to the negro as before to arouse no suspicions, and madame had returned to her home, Nick, after taking down the trap, must have attempted as usual to ascend by the ropes, and exhausted by the night's labor had grown dizzy, and when close to the top of the shaft had dropped downwards.

They found him there the next morning, his form crushed to powder, and his face lying upon his veronica. Countess Toboskie and Lady Jet are close friends, and together often visit a massive monument reared above Count Smoloff's remains, which were brought on from Siberia and now repose in his native land.

Secretary Polleskie and his wife still reside in Siberia. Whether the secretary ever became aware of the complicity of his wife in the escape of the object of his mad infatuation is not known. He has grown colder, more silent, and, while she has no rival, his wife is content with the polite attention, the cool indifference of his demeanor.

* * * * * *

And in the centre of the Schaffuskie Lands is a long, slim mound, that contains all that is mortal of Valentine. It was her desire to lie here, and for this purpose Toboskie purchased the estate. The lands themselves lie rotting and deserted. Season after season succeed one another, but find no change, as the rich soil goes to waste, the houses lie empty, and death and destruction are all that are visible. And in the midst of this desolation, with a sullen gloom brooding over the noxious brakes, the sullen, stagnant waters, the rich lands now decayed and traversed only by wild brutes and poisonous reptiles, lies the woman in the dreamless repose she so long coveted.

THE ORDEALS OF THE CUSTOM HOUSE.

IT is a bright and sunshiny morning, and the sails in our beautiful bay are white as snowflakes. Out across the blue waters of the Atlantic appears the feathery smoke of an ocean steamer mingling with the clouds, soft as swan's-down. The practiced eye of the lookout at Quarantine Station announces that a "White Star" is in sight, and in less than two hours the stately steamer casts anchor opposite Quarantine, and swings lazily round to the tide. As we approach in our saucy tug, the bulwarks are crowded with eager and smiling faces, all sun-kissed and bronzed and sea-beaten. The hats—for ladies usually don their best when land is announced—are bewildering, both as regards variety and color, while the misters, male and female, are of the raciest pattern and the newest designs. The Quarantine boat had already decanted the officer of health, and, as we draw alongside, the gaze that we encounter from hundreds of pairs of eyes is unmistakably that of welcome.

A port on the vessel's side is open, one or two of the ship's officers standing just inside, and the rope-ladder has already been placed over the bulwarks and down the side of the steamer. A few minutes more and the doctor has gone on board, and all is right. The little group from the cutter scramble over its side on to the doctor's boat, and, crossing it, gather at the foot of the ladder. First the staff, papers in hand, hurry with practiced ease up the ropes and off at the side into the port. One after another of the visitors follow, with more or less haste and agility, and very soon the last of the party has disappeared inside the vessel. The little group of newcomers, expecting friends on board, hasten up-stairs on deck, and scatter in every direction to meet their long-absent relatives and friends and many an eager and hearty greeting now takes place that can better be imagined than described.

Meanwhile the staff-officer in charge has received the passenger-list from the purser of the ship, and, attended by the others of the staff, hastens to the main saloon, where they take their seats at the end of one of the long tables in the centre of the room. Here the blanks and papers for the declarations are now laid out, and everything is ready for the work before them. They are scarcely well in the room, however, and seated, when the cabin-passengers begin to gather inside the doorway, and, all being ready, the work of preparing the declarations begins: "What is your name, sir?" asks the staff-officer, at the head of the table, as the first passenger presents himself. "Are you traveling alone—how many in your family?" is the question next asked.

"Myself and wife," is the reply.

"Where do you reside?"

"In New York."

"What baggage have you?"

"Well, I think we have four trunks and some smaller baggage."

"Any valises, wraps, or other hand-baggage?"

"Two valises, a satchel and three rugs."

"Have you anything new or dutiable?"

"No; nothing at all."

"Any piece goods, samples, or presents for others?"

"Nothing at all of the kind."

"Any wearing apparel not in use, or lady's wearing apparel that has not been worn?"

"Nothing whatever but what we have been actually wearing," is the passenger's reply.

"You swear that these statements are true? Sign it there," says the officer, as he hands the declaration on which he has entered these particulars as rapidly as they were uttered to the passenger to sign, and immediately passes it to another of the staff, who numbers it, gives the gentleman a ticket with the corresponding number, and folds it carefully away, while still another officer further along the table, with the passenger-list in hand, is checking off each passenger's name as his declaration is made complete. Now the passengers come, in larger and still increasing numbers, into the saloon, and gather in crowds around the table where the staff are at work. Soon the bustle and hurry become greater and greater, and the officers begin to have fully as much as they can do to respond to all demands, actively and rapidly as they work. Human nature in all its varieties presents itself, as one after another of the throng assembled round the officers' table comes forward to make his declarations. Here a gentleman passenger, in reply to the query, "Have you any new or dutiable goods?" answers, "I have nothing for myself, but have two dozen pairs of kid gloves for a friend." While he is yet speaking it is entered under the appropriate heading on the declaration, together with the value, if known, and a mark, understood by the inspectors who are to examine the baggage, is put on the back of the papers, to indicate at a glance that there is something "declared" among the baggage of that party.

Another gentleman states, when asked if he has anything dutiable in his trunks: "I have a cloak purchased in Paris for my daughter."

"New, of course?"

"Well—yes."

"Anything else new?"

"Well, I believe we have some china bought on the other side."

"Its value is——"

"A hundred and twenty-five dollars, I believe, but here are the bills," and these being produced and glanced at, the approximate value is set down opposite it on the declaration. Still another passenger, evidently a legal luminary from some country town, argues every question asked him with the officers, murmurs at every answer that he has to make, lectures the officers on the law relative to baggage, and finally takes his declaration off to his stateroom to read it carefully through before he signs his name. So the work has been going on for the last hour and more, and the crowd now begins to fall off. The officers have been asking one after another, as he or she comes up, the same queries repeated over and over, answering at the same time all kinds of inquiries as to when the baggage will be allowed to come off, how soon it would be examined, when the passengers could go off the dock, etc., to one inquirer after another patiently and good-naturedly, and at the same time promptly and systematically, going through with the declarations of the hundred and more of cabin-passengers to whom they have had to attend. Meanwhile, however, the passengers have nearly all completed their declarations, with the exception of one and another straggling in now and again apparently having just wakened up to the fact that such a matter has to be attended to, and while the morning's work of the last two hours has been proceeding the steamer has been making her way up the bay and along the North River quite up to the city. Going up on deck, we find that she is, indeed, near her pier. On the upper deck, as it approaches, the cabin-passengers are gathered along the side in anxious groups looking for some expected friend to meet them on their arrival. On the lower deck beneath, the throng of steerage-passengers eagerly press to the vessel's side, anxiously looking, with faces showing varying expressions of wonder, disappointment or gratification, at the strange shore which they are about to touch. At the end of the dock are groups of friends of the passengers waiting anxiously for those they have come to meet; there is an expressman waiting expectantly for the coming baggage, laborers and policemen bustling about, keeping the way clear or blocking it up alternately, and a Customs officer standing by waiting patiently and resignedly for his morning's work to begin. Now the ropes are thrown and placed, the engines begin to work, the vessel comes nearer and nearer, almost close to the dock. On the upper deck the officers of the ship are giving their final orders for bringing the vessel up to its place, and now the dark-blue uniforms of the surgeon's staff begins to show itself among the passengers on deck.

"Stand one side!" cries the policeman at the end of the pier. Some twenty stout laborers bring out the gang-plank in readiness, and the side-rail of the vessel is taken off the lower deck. The long and heavy "gang-plank" is, after several attempts, brought in place, and the vessel is at last connected with the shore. A Customs officer, who has been waiting for this point, at a word from his superior close by, takes his place on guard at the foot of the plank.

Now all is bustle on board the vessel. The passengers, with their valises, wraps and other hand-baggage, either carried by themselves or their servants, come out of the cabin and state-rooms, and, from the deck, fathers of families, or gentlemen with wives or daughters under their protection, give a final order about their trunks and accompaniments; the staff officers, with their declarations in hand, come down on the dock, and the passengers hasten down the gang-plank, eager once more to be on terra firma in America.

On the pier all is now apparent confusion. The groups of friends, who had not gone on board, are engaged in short and interesting conversation with their newly-arrived companions, or are assisting them with the many pieces of their lighter luggage, or yet bustling about at the end of the dock, while waiting for the trunks that are now about to come from the vessel. Now the passengers begin to stroll along and gather in groups about half-way down the dock. The Customs officers have already formed their line across the pier, further along, and the staff officers have taken up their position, declarations in hand, where they can most readily attend to any call from the passengers, and also most promptly direct the officers in their work. It is now fairly along in the morning, and the passengers, who have, perhaps, been up most of the previous night, expecting to come up to the city much earlier, are looking weary and anxious to get home. Satchel and valise and wrap-bundle in hand, they begin to come up, singly and in groups, to the staff officers, and ask if they cannot have their baggage attended to at once, so that they may go.

"Have you all your baggage together?" is his reply; and as they remember that the greater part of it is not yet on the dock, he kindly and patiently advises them—one and another, and still another again—to watch their trunks as they come over the ship's side and have them put together, and then they will at once be attended to.

Meanwhile, however, the larger baggage is being sent off the vessel more and more, and the company's laborers are wheeling the trunks down the pier, closer and closer, and in increasing numbers, and depositing them in confused heaps in such spaces as may yet be vacant for their reception on the muddy flooring. Now a passenger, after bustling anxiously about, has at last got all his trunks and other baggage together. He hastens to a staff officer, tells him that he has them all ready, and asks eagerly to be attended to at once. The officer takes the number on the ticket which he gives, looks over the declarations in his hand to find the one corresponding, calls one of the officers from the line, and handing it to him, directs him to examine the gentleman's baggage. The inspecting officer, after a preparatory glance at the declaration, noting whether anything dutiable is declared or not, accompanies the passenger to where his luggage is placed.

The smaller valises, bags, satchels, bundles, etc. are opened and examined, quickly but carefully, with a practiced eye, and, all being correct, are marked and passed. Then a trunk is unlocked by the owner, the upper tray is lifted out, the officer, with a quick eye and hand, takes a comprehensive view of its contents, and, finding nothing dutiable, marks it "passed" as it is closed, and the owner wearily but gladly relocks it and turns it over to one of the expressmen waiting to receive it. So it goes with another and another piece of baggage. Along the dock now the scene is becoming animated and confused.

The porters still continue bringing on trunk after trunk and piece after piece of baggage; passengers are coming up to the staff and having their declarations picked out and officers assigned to examine, as they get their luggage together in position to do so, and the scene we have just described is being repeated, with variations, all over the pier. Here an elderly, hearty-looking gentleman has apparently forgotten to mention in his declaration the piece of silk that he has carefully folded away among the contents of his trunk. The experienced hands of the good-natured but careful officer bring it to light where it lays, not very deeply concealed among the various articles of clothing. The Appraiser is called for, the silk is carefully examined by his practiced hands, its cost is inquired and considered, and in a moment more it is entered on the declaration by the appraiser, with the rate of duty attached, and, if nothing further is found dutiable in his remaining trunks, our elderly friend goes hurriedly and a little disappointed to the office on the dock to pay the entry clerk in attendance the duty on the parcel that has been found, so that it also can be marked and passed with his other baggage, to be taken off the dock.

Further along, an officer is examining the baggage of a family traveling together. Trunk after trunk and valise after valise has been brought and heaped together in confusion on the dock. The officer, in a moment, brings down the trunks in place, such as there is, in the confined space left for their reception. The trunks of the gentlemen of the party are now opened one by one by their owners or attendants. The officer gives a quick but thorough examination of their contents. Nothing but clothing, evidently in use, or traveling necessaries, in these. So the gentlemen's trunks are examined, found all correct, marked and passed. And now the inspector comes to the baggage of the ladies of the party—trunks larger, heavier and apparently much more difficult to be opened, as key after key is tried without success by the unaccustomed hand of the husband or brother. At last the trunk is opened, the upper trays are lifted out and laid on the top of the unopened trunks, so as not to be soiled on the muddy floor of the pier, and the examination begins. The quick hands of the officer, careful and nice through long practice, raise and feel one after another of the dresses and other pretty and delicate articles of apparel within.

"Have you worn this dress, madam?" is now asked, as the officer's eyes fall upon a costume, carefully packed and in such good order as to puzzle the inexperienced as to whether it lays there just as it has come from the hands of some Parisian modiste, or whether its fair owner has really had it made and worn it during her Summer in Europe.

"Oh, yes, I have worn that a number of times," replies the lady.

"And this one?" raising another dress further down in the trunk, and also of a slightly doubtful appearance as to its newness and wear.

"Oh, that is an old one made over new while we were in Paris," answers the lady, in a rather dissatisfied tone, evidently thinking it wholly unnecessary that she should be annoyed by such (after all quite necessary) queries. The good sense and courteous bearing of the officer, however, soon show that he is only doing his duty carefully, and the examination proceeds. If a doubt arises as to the fact of any dress having been worn, the appraiser is called for, and his practiced eye and prompt decision settle the question, either as to its being dutiable or not, and so the work goes on. All over the pier the laborers are industriously wheeling along their hand-trucks, laden with trunks, in every direction, heaping everything in endless confusion, and crowding in every imaginable way the temporary thoroughfare among the baggage. Passengers are bustling here and there, getting their baggage ready for examination, or anxiously and rather wearily also—in the hot and confined atmosphere of the dock—looking on at the officers examining it and eagerly waiting for its completion. The officers themselves look almost wearied out with the constant strain of their morning's work, amid all the confusion and bustle of the dock, requiring every sense on the alert, and at the same time a pleasant word and prompt attention to passenger after passenger as the hours go by. The staff officers are at their posts here and there along the centre of the dock, ready of access and affable to all, giving ear to one after another call on their attention, examining declarations, assigning officers to baggage, and patiently answering question after question from one or another dissatisfied or uninformed passenger, and seemingly calm and unwearied amid the constant and unceasing turmoil around them. The Deputy Surveyor, with all the responsibility and care, in charge of the proper execution of the morning's work, walks quietly about the pier, undistinguished by any particular mark of office, but grasping all that is going on with an experienced eye, and directing the whole work in a manner quiet and assuming, but that, at the same time, commands respect and attention at once.

Courteous, though decided in speech, firm and earnest in action, both officers and passengers soon perceive that to his mind the proper and faithful execution of, and compliance with, the established laws—unpleasant though they may seem—is, after all, the most rapid and pleasant manner of progressing with the work of the examination and passing of the baggage.

The dock is now more clear of the trunks and packages that so lately covered it, as one expressman after another takes them—as they are marked and passed by the inspectors; the passengers pass off gradually, attended by their welcoming friends, eager, after their long confinement on board ship and on the dock this morning, to be once more on their way home through the streets of New York. The peculiar bustle and confusion of an hour ago soon begin to disappear—to give place to the, perhaps, still greater confusion of the daily traffic on the dock. But now the morning hours have nearly passed away. The last of the passengers on the pier have had their baggage examined, and, with it, have left for home, while in the office, at the street-end of the dock, the entry clerk from the Custom House is engaged in making up from the declarations his returns of the duties they have paid; the officers, no longer needed, return to the barge office or to their next post of duty, and the inspectors, who are assigned to discharge the cargo, come on the pier and take charge, and the work of disembarking the passengers from the White Star steamer is over.

THE CITY OF RIO DE JANEIRO.

A RECENT traveler, descanting upon the attractions of the Brazilian capital, says: "I am a little at a loss to explain why it is that people who have seen most of the fine cities in the world, including Edinburgh, should be in rapture with Rio, should find it a revelation of a new kind of loveliness; but so it is." At every turn you are met by a vision of steep, green hills, bearing flower-laden terraces, from which white villas rise, one above the other, in sparkling confusion; or you look down a narrow, brilliantly-colored and busy street, and behold, framed like a picture, a blue, tropical sea, with white sails gleaming in the distance and solemn mountains on either hand.

The city is not cramped for room, but stretches over a large space, and all the good houses have ample gardens. These are duly surrounded by thick stone walls, but tropical nature needs no such barriers. Roses and orange-trees mount up aloft; nearly every tree bears flowers as well as foliage; creepers with blossoms of every hue fling themselves over the walls, and lofty palm-trees stand like vigorous guardians of the domain. We are too accustomed to associate the idea of palm-trees with torrid, sandy plains, that the sight of them, strange and beautiful, standing amid green lawns and gardens full of scarlet flowers, is most astonishing. It makes no difference though, after a time, where a palm-tree stands. It is in itself so beautiful an object—the tall, smooth, gray-green stem is so elegant, the long, glossy branches so graceful—that it lends an indescribable air of dignity to any spot in which it happens to grow. The Brazilians are very fond of planting two palm-trees, one on either side of the tall iron gates which, hung between massive stone piers, give access to their gardens.

The bay, which the city overlooks, comprises a large number of reaches, or small bays, and is dotted with upwards of forty islands, from one of which, the Ilha das Cobras, located opposite the Naval Arsenal, our sketch was taken.

The foreground of the engraving illustrates only the commercial and least attractive part of the city, the principal residences being either back of the city or upon the hills in its centre. The principal buildings are the Custom House, the Mint, the Insane Hospital, the Mercy's Hospital, the Imperial Palace, the Lyric Theatre, the Hall of St. Pedro, and the College of Pedro II. The great equestrian statue of Dom Pedro I., the docks and the aqueduct, deserve the special notice of tourists.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Spirit of the Southern Press on the Result.

From the Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist.

AWAITING events, and not being unduly apprehensive of them, let us all attend closely to our own immediate affairs, do as much business as possible and make as much money. The South will best disarm the prejudice of her enemies by her struggle for commercial prosperity and a wide patriotism that seeks the common glory of the whole country. This, we believe, she will do, and if unjustly attacked in that attitude and galled by unfriendly legislation, she will be righted by the same majorities that made Mr. Garfield's Presidency possible.

From the New Orleans Times (Dem.).

WHILE holding to the great Democratic principle of local self-government and opposing encroachments on the Constitution, it is the duty of the South to cease playing second fiddle to the unreliable, dough-faced Democracy of the North, and unite in raising and supporting such economic issues as will tend to increase her material wealth and prosperity.

From the Vicksburg Herald (Dem.).

WE have allowed our extreme men to have too much influence. We have shouted for a full vote, a free ballot and a fair count, while we winked at almost any efforts to pull this or that candidate through. We have denounced the grab game of the Republicans, but at the same time we have played it pretty strong ourselves. We have decried the use of supervisors in Northern cities, but we have not kept our own skirts clean. In trying to deceive our opponents we have deceived ourselves and destroyed our friends, the Thurmans, the McDonalds and the Wallaces of the North. Defeated and humiliated, we are confronted by a stalwart President, backed by a Republican House. We must stand firm, face the situation and meet it like men. We must not commit the errors in the future that our extreme men committed in the past. When we make platforms we must live up to them. We must accept the amendments in good faith, or give the Bourbons the reins and prepare to receive another dose of reconstruction. We still have the Senate, but we will not have it long unless we drive the Ere-eaters of the South to the rear and keep them there. Even the control of our local affairs is endangered by the criminal blunders of the bilots who rely on bulldozing, fraud, hypocrisy and perjury.

From the Richmond (Va.) Whig (Dem.).

THIS thing of Democratic defeat has become monotonous. For a quarter of a century the party's portion has been a succession of reverses. What is to be done about it? Are we to play this losing game for ever?

For our part, we believe that a new deal is not merely desirable but inevitable. It is not in the nature of men to be constant to failure and misfortune, no matter how closely allied these may be to even the most exalted virtues and the purest principles. Without necessarily deserting either the virtues or the principles, they are sure sooner or later to seek some resource, some avenue of escape, from fast-coming disaster; and, of a truth, the followers of the Democratic party have attested their fidelity by a long devotion which now deserves some relaxation and indulgence. We do not know what should be done, but we are confident that something in the way of a new combination of all the elements opposed to the dominant power in the Republican party must be effected if ever that party is to be hurled from control.

From the Louisville Courier-Journal (Dem.).

WITH the break-up of the South, which can no longer be held solid, will come in time the break-up of the Solid North. Yielding to no one in detestation for the party record of the man who has been elected President of the United States, we declared early in the canvass what we here take leave to repeat, that he is a person of commanding intellect, a voluminous experience in public affairs, incapable alike of personal venality or malignity, and capable of being and of wishing to be a just Chief Magistrate. That this will be his purpose and policy we sincerely hope. He is ambitious withal, and having a mind and heart which do not want for virtues to guide him, and, unlike his predecessor, coming in at the front and not at the back door, it will be a crime which he can see and whose consequences he can measure if he does not rely upon the country at large for his support and seek the very earliest opportunity to declare his independence of the corrupt and despotic bosses who will seek to rule his administration with an iron rod.

From the Richmond State (Dem.).

THE reasons which led the country to this decision have been much discussed. But the fact seems to be that the controlling cause was a distrust in the North and West of the Democratic party—a distrust of the South, which found its justification in the fact that the Democratic party was not united in policy. The Republicans had at least a color of reason when they charged that the Democracy was not a party, but a mere heap of men, an agglomeration, whose sole idea was to seek office. Let us look the fact in the face. The Democracy will continue to be a sectional party until the day when it unites on some leading principles of government, finance, tariff, civil service and foreign policy.

From the Charleston News and Courier (Dem.).

IT is the part of elevated statesmanship to avoid and discountenance false issues. The South has been kept solid by the conviction that in no other way could the inalienable rights guaranteed by the Constitution be effectively maintained. We answer for it that if the Southern States can be relieved of this feeling (as they would have been had Hancock been elected), the Southern people will turn their thoughts and attention to practical business affairs, and will be ruled, in politics, by the considerations which control voters in States where the negro is an abstraction and the carpet-bagger an unknown quantity. That will be the end of the Solid South. The lines may run from North to South hereafter. Better still, each community will seek its own advantage, hoping at the same time that the aggregation of local advantages will comport with the good fortune, happiness and freedom of the whole people.

From the Columbia (S. C.) Register (Dem.).

WITH Garfield in the Presidential chair, for whom the Republicans have claimed so much in the way of ability and statesmanship, we shall see what we shall see. One thing is certain, if he is half the man he is claimed to be, if he is only half a statesman in the true sense of the word, he will hold his own and be his own successor in 1884. Not only this, if he bravely and broadly opens the way for ways of peace and the sway of broad common sense in the solution of the troubles and antagonisms which have arisen under the shallow-headed, mean and vindictive policy hitherto pursued by blind partisans, he will find the Solid South meeting him more than half way, while he shall have earned the surpassing honor of having inaugurated an era of prosperity in which the country, the whole country, will forget their jeopardling hatreds, and "sit down under their own vine and fig-tree, with none to molest or make them afraid." Garfield has the head sufficient for this work. Has he the nerve, character and constancy?

PROFESSOR TYNDALL, in the course of his inaugural address before the Glasgow Sunday Society, took the ground that the Society, by opening museums, picture-galleries, libraries and public gardens on Sunday, would be acting as competitors with the public-houses; and if they were established on tramways from the slums of London to the nearest green fields they would also be doing a great benefit to the community, and even preaching a true gospel to them. Resolutions were adopted approving of the action of the Sunday Society, and declaring that the time had arrived for the opening of the national museums and picture-galleries.

MINISTER LOWELL'S opening address at the Winter session of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution was listened to by a large audience of distinguished personages, and was enthusiastically received. His subject was the "True Principle of Shakespearean Criticism." It is unusual to choose a purely literary topic for such an occasion, but the experiment was brilliantly successful. The Scotsman says it is impossible to describe the charm of his manner, the constant play of his humor, his happiness of expression, delicate suggestiveness and fine criticism. It expresses gratitude to the American Government for sending Mr. Lowell as Minister.

PRINCE ALEXANDER, the present ruler of Bulgaria, having recently come into a legacy of a million and a half dollars, left to him by the late Empress of Russia, his aunt by marriage, is about to build a splendid palace in the new quarter of Sofia, at the east end of that city, where several large and handsome houses are in course of erection for the future accommodation of Bulgarian rank and fashion. The youthful Hospodar is just now in a lucky vein. Only the other day Bishop Gligor presented him with a tastefully laid out park, about half an hour's drive from Rustchuk, eminently suitable for a Summer retreat; and the prince, while gracefully accepting this munificent gift, sagaciously seized the opportunity of adding to his popularity by forthwith issuing a decree in virtue of which the park in question is to be thrown open to the Bulgarian public during three hours of every day for all time to come.

M. VICTORIEN SARDOU, THE DRAMATIC AUTHOR.

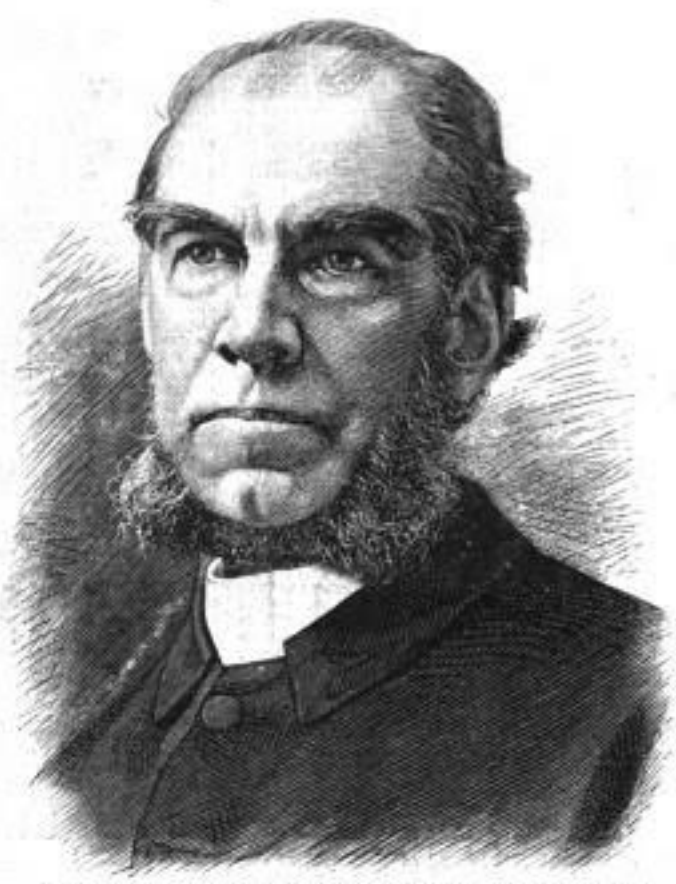
M. VICTORIEN SARDOU.

M. VICTORIEN SARDOU is without doubt the most prominent of the French dramatists of to-day. He has written some two-score plays in half as many years. He is not yet fifty; he is very rich; he is the youngest member of the French Academy, and it is to his plays that he owes his riches and his seat with the "forty immortals." He was born in Paris, September 7th, 1831, and was early entered as a medical student, but he soon gave up medicine for history. The ten years between 1850 and 1860 were years of misery and want. He taught, served as an usher in a school, did hack writing for dictionary-makers and in cheap newspapers, and wrote various plays that were refused right and left. But in 1854 the Odéon accepted a three-act comedy in verse, which was hissed at its first representation. After this failure he fell back into obscurity and wrote one or two semi-scientific stories. In 1858 he married Mlle. de Brecourt, an actress and intimate friend of Dejazet. At the house of the latter he met Vanderbuch, who had written several plays for Dejazet, and the two dramatists wrote together "Les Premières Armes de Figaro." At the end of 1859 the actress opened a theatre with the play and made it a success.

The doors of the Parisian theatre having thus been opened by Dejazet to M. Sardou, he at once rushed in, and within five years (1860-1864) produced nearly twenty plays of one kind and another—comedy, farce, drama, or opera. Two of these rapidly-produced plays achieved an instant and lasting success, "Les Pattes de Mouche" and "Nos Intimes," both being brought out in 1861. In the next seven years he produced in Paris only seven plays, including three of his best pieces. In 1865 was brought out "La Famille Benoiton," the first of a series of satires on society as it exists nowadays in France. The play was revived at the Vaudeville during the Exhibition of 1867 to keep company with another play of M. Sardou's at the Gymnase, "Nos Bons Villageois," which was the second in the series of satires. In 1869 his historical drama "Patrie" was brought out at the Porte St. Martin Theatre. Its scene was laid in the Netherlands, and the work was appropriately dedicated to John Lothrop Motley. After the close of the Franco-German war the first piece Sardou presented to the public of Paris was "Le Roi Carotte," set to music by the late Jacques Offenbach. His "L'Oncle Sam" was forbidden production by the censors on the ground of being an insult to a friendly nation, but it found representation outside of France. His latest work, "Daniel Rochat," now being performed in New York City, was produced for the first time in the Théâtre Français, Paris, on the night of February 16th last. Only once before had the "dramatist of the Boulevards" crossed the classic threshold of the house of Molière, his later writing having been for the Gymnase, where a first representation of any of his works is looked upon as one of the most fashionable events of the season.

M. Sardou always takes a great interest in the mounting of his pieces, and has been reproached with too great an affection for upholstery. What he aims at, however, is to make his plays as realistic as may be consistent with dramatic effect, and, while eschewing hansom cabs and real waterfalls, he is anxious that no anachronisms or impossible incidents should be allowed to creep in ungerceived.

ARCHITECTURAL PROGRESS OF NEW YORK CITY.



RESIDENCE OF FREDERICK W. STEVENS.

OPPOSITE the new residence of Cornelius Vanderbilt, on the southwest corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, is the grand dwelling of Mr. Frederick W. Stevens, for which, with its furniture, it is said he recently refused the sum of one million dollars. A modification of the old French château style in vogue some three or four hundred years ago, it is the chief ornament of this fashionable locality, abounding in fine houses, and promises to be a landmark for the future. Its solid walls, turrets and towers, remind one of feudal times shady parks and grassy lawns. In dimensions it is about seventy-four feet front on the avenue by seventy feet deep, three stories in height, with a mansard roof built of brick and Cleveland stone in the way of trimmings. The interior is finished in hard wood, in a rich, substantial manner, with much solid paneling and some artistic carving. The building has been made substantially fireproof, through the medium of hollow tiling, which forms an effectual barrier against fire on each particular story. The main stairway, of oak, is double-lathed and plastered; the private stairway in the tower is of iron. An iron roof covered with slate precludes all danger of fire from the outside.

The house is provided with an elevator worked by water, a hydrostatic lift, which goes from the first to the third story. Practically it is self-acting, and runs night and day all the year round. These hydrostatic lifts are being of late generally adopted in the more elaborate of our modern first class dwellings. The conservatory occupies a prominent position on the second floor, communicating directly with the chief dwelling apartment. The towers not only add much to the picturesqueness of the structure, but have been cleverly adapted to practical uses. The dwelling is said to be a museum of art. The walls of one room—the dining-hall—are covered with old Moorish saddle-bags of figured leather, collected by Mr. Stevens during a prolonged visit to southern Spain. The houses that were torn down to make way for Mr. Stevens's mansion are occupied now by wealthy people one block to the eastward. Every stone was numbered and replaced in its original position, on the new site, in the same manner that was adopted when the Rev. Dr. John Hall's old church was moved.

and, after studying at the General Theological Seminary, was ordained by Bishop Brownell. His first charge was in the beautiful village of Stratford, Conn., whence, after a rectorship of five and a half years, he was called to St. Peter's Church, Brooklyn, New York. On the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ministry there, on the first Sunday after Easter in this year, he stated, as reported in an address published in one of the local papers, that he found about seventy communicants worshiping in a small brick church. This building was soon relinquished for a larger stone edifice, by the side of which have since risen a beautiful Sunday-school and rectory, making a group of ecclesiastical buildings rarely surpassed. The communicants have, for many years, numbered four or five hundred. Dr. Paddock has been, from the beginning of the Diocese of Long Island, a member of the Standing Committee, and for several years connected with the Board or Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

At the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization of St. Peter's Church, on May 18th, 1873, the Rev. A. N. Littlejohn, D. D., Bishop of the diocese, greeted the congregation with a warm letter of sympathy, in which he spoke thus of the pastor:

"The man of God who is over you in the Lord is one of whom his Bishop may speak freely at this time, and of whom, at all times, his brethren speak affectionately. Sound in the faith, judicious in counsel, prudent in administration, habitually devoted to the duties of his ministry, giving mind and heart and body to this one thing, loving every member of the fold with the tenderness of a true shepherd, carrying the lambs in his bosom, teaching from house to house, watchful over the sick sympathizing with the afflicted, balanced and steady in his work under trial and discouragement: I assure you, dear brethren, the character and services of such a man, as they have been God's best gift to you, so they account for the unity and peace which have prevailed in your borders, and, through these, for other blessings that have distinguished your parish. Long may a parish, which has been so richly favored of God and man, be continued in your midst."

It is expected that the new Bishop will be consecrated on December 15th.

THE WEST VIRGINIA HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

THIS institution is located at Weston, West Virginia, a beautiful town on the banks of the West Fork of the Monongahela River. The town has a population of 2,000, and is the county seat of Lewis County. One of the best narrow-gauge railroads in the country connect Weston with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Clarksburg, twenty-five miles distant.

The hospital, standing among the mountains of West Virginia, is one of the finest structures of the kind in the Union. It is built of solid blue sandstone, handsomely cut in pitch, and smooth-faced ashlar-work, with suitable ornamentations, and is covered with slate-roofing. The plastering is pure white, hard finish, with appropriate cornice-arches, etc. Each ward is 200 feet long. The sections are one, two and three stories high. The entire front is 1,211 feet 4 inches, although its inside capacity has a lineal length of 1,226 feet 4 inches. The centre building is five stories high, and is surmounted by a tower 100 feet high. Each section has a tower 118 feet high. There is also a brick hospital, 53 by 81 feet, detached, which is used for quiet patients; also a brick hospital for the colored insane, which is in all respects equal to the other hospitals, and has ample room for all the colored insane in the State.

There are at present 500 patients in the hospital and about 35 outside, giving the State about 525 insane in a population of 626,000, or one insane person to every 1,100 of population.

There are 300 acres of land attached to the hospital. The grounds in front are ornamented with fountains, lakes, bridges, walks, groves, etc.

The buildings have 8 acres of slate-roofing, 9 acres of flooring, 906 doors, 921 windows, 411 rooms, 1½ miles of sewer-pipe, ¼ mile of ventilating-pipe, 18 miles of heating-pipe, 2¼ miles of gas-pipe, 12 miles of water-pipe and 2 miles of spouting or drain pipe.

The directors, at their meeting in October last, reported that the executive as well as the medical department of the institution is in good condition—the patients being well clothed, fed, and medicines and medical attention given for the past year at $2.17 16-100 per capita per week. This includes all expenses—pays officers' salaries, wages, clothing, food, medicines, etc. This is, perhaps, lower than any other hospital in the country.

The present superintendent, Dr. T. B. Carnden, has had charge of the hospitals over nine years. His assistant, Dr. A. H. Kunst, has held his position twelve years. A second-assistant physician, Dr. Lewis, has been recently appointed.

THE CANADA PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE Canada Pacific Railway, which is now in the hands of a syndicate, is one of the great enterprises of the time. The Government has guaranteed to the syndicate $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land; finishes the portions of the road at present being constructed, and hands them over, with the portions already constructed, to the company when the whole line is finished. The company gives security to the amount of $1,000,000, together with a certain portion of land as security for the working of the line. Estimating the land at $2 per acre, the gross subsidy, with the completed sections, represents a sum of $100,000,000 that the Government pays the syndicate for constructing the road.

The eastern terminus of the road is at Lake Nipissing, just northwest of Ottawa, where it connects with other Canadian railways, and the western terminus will be at Burrard's Inlet, at the mouth of the Fraser River. For 500 or 600 miles in the western part of the road it will run through a comparatively unsettled, rather mountainous, and in places barren country. Two hundred and sixty miles of the road have been completed, and it is expected that trains will be running over 700 miles at the end of a year. Work will be pushed vigorously throughout the Winter, as it is claimed that snow-storms will prove less of an obstacle through that locality than they were found to be along our Pacific roads. The interests of British Columbia and Canada are intimately connected, and it is announced that the former will be incorporated in the latter upon the completion of the road. The western terminus will be a thousand miles north of San Francisco, and sanguine persons expect this road will surpass all those south of it. One writer says: "The Canada Pacific Road will absorb a large proportion of the Pacific traffic. It will bring Europe and the East closer together. The products of Eastern Asia can be sent to Europe over it quicker and at less cost than they are now being carried over the American railroads. The English trade with India and China over this road is expected to be very great, and the through traffic from the Far West will also be immense. English goods will be shipped to Canada and carried over the Intercolonial and Canada Pacific Railroad to British Columbia, whence they can be transported to India at a great saving of time and expense. It will be almost a straight line from Liverpool to India over this road. The produce of the Northwestern States of America will also find its way to Europe over it. That trade can easily be tapped by a branch line from Minneapolis to connect with the Canada Pacific."

Professor Macoun and other authorities estimate that there are at least 200,000,000 acres of good land in the northwest, so that after satisfying the land grant to the syndicate and their own reserves, the Canadian Government will still have 175,000,000 acres to dispose of. It is proposed to sell enough of this to enable the Government to construct branch roads running north from the main line and to improve the navigation of the Saskatchewan and other rivers. A section of the road is in process of construction from Winnipeg to Thunder Bay, and will be completed in about two years. Another is building from Winnipeg west, and a third in British Columbia. The length of the road when finished will be about two thousand miles. It will take from eight to ten years to build it through.

Our illustration on page 209 presents a view of Rat Portage, in the district of Keewatin, Canada, which has been brought into some prominence in connection with this road. Rat Portage is beautifully situated at the northern extremity of the Lake of the Woods. For years a post of the Hudson Bay Company, without a habitation beyond their palisade, excepting the picturesque wigwams of their dusky customers, its solitude was rudely broken in June, 1879, by the contractors for Section B of the Canadian Pacific making the place their headquarters. Section B extends from Rat Portage, sixty-five miles easterly, to Eagle River, through a very difficult country for railroading; its completion will cost about four and a half million dollars. The prospect of this large expenditure speedily transformed the solitude of Rat Portage into a village of log buildings and railroaders, but it is only recently that discoveries of gold and silver on the islands and shores of the Lake of the Woods, in close proximity to the town, have attracted the attention of the busy outside world.

The lake extends about 100 miles south to the boundary line and is 80 miles wide. Its surface is covered with over 3,000 rocky islands which present some magnificent views to tourists, offering a delightful change to residents of the flat prairie country in the West, but especially attractive to miners and explorers, who are rapidly getting mining claims surveyed and patented. Nothing will be done towards developing the mines until the railroad runs from Winnipeg to Rat Portage and can be made available for bringing in machinery. This obstacle will be surmounted by the "iron horse" before Christmas, and the town will not unlikely become the centre of a large and rich mining country. Meantime explorers have been making new discoveries almost daily and are busy taking up claims and making preparations for the expected rush. A large hotel, with forty rooms, was opened November 1st to meet the demand for better accommodations than can be found at the railroad boarding-houses.

FUN.

THE little princess cannot yet walk Spanish.

A PROMINENT citizen, when asked if he was going to decorate, replied: "Yes; when the procession passes I'll raise the window, stick out my red head, show the whites of my eyes and look blue."

"IF you will consent to my marriage with your daughter, she will be treated as if she were an angel." "That is," was the matter-of-fact reply, "in a short time she would not have anything to wear."

"IF I have ever used any unkind words, Hannah," said Mr. Smiley to Mrs. Smiley, reflectively, "I take them all back." "Yes, I suppose you want to use them over again," was the not very soothing reply.

THEY were talking of a man who was afflicted with the dropsy, and somebody said that he had been tapped the day before. "Then his case is hopeless. Nothing ever lasts more than a few days that is tapped in that house."

THE faculty of an Ohio female seminary has issued orders that no pupil shall have more than one male visitor per week. The smart girls invite their young men to call on Sunday, so that when their fathers come on Monday the old men find themselves barred out.

A MEMPHIS man wanted to kill a musquito on the back of a friend's neck, and without stopping to mention his design, hit the insect a belt, and when his friend got up and brushed the sand out of his mouth and eyes, four men had to hold him while the matter was explained.

MRS. FOGARTY has been experimenting again. This time it was at pressing leaves. She heard everybody talking about it; so she tried it. She says she pressed and pressed, but didn't get more than half a thimbleful of juice, "and that didn't taste like nothin' nuther."

AMONG the gifts displayed at a San Francisco wedding was the bride's father's check for $100,000. The cashier of the bank on which the check was drawn was a guest. It was observed that he looked queerly at the document, then turned up his nose, and remarked: "Why, he hasn't $500 to his credit in our bank."

THE drinking water at Milwaukee has become so stringy that it cannot be swallowed in the ordinary way, and is now used as a breakfast-dish—fried, roasted or boiled to suit the taste. Some prudent housewives are drying and smoking a supply of it for Winter use. Beer has been substituted as a quencher of thirst.

A SEEDY-looking man applied to a candidate for ten dollars. He said a few friends of the candidate wanted to make preparation already to celebrate his election. "But suppose I am defeated?" "Well, then, we can use the money in celebrating your not being elected. We are not particular, as long as we celebrate."

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

IN AN OLD AND OBSTINATE CASE OF DYSPEPSIA.

I GAVE HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE to an old and obstinate case of dyspepsia with the most happy result. He is now better than he has been in years.

ATMORES' MINCE MEAT and PLUM PUDDING, advertised in our columns, are par excellence. The scrupulous cleanliness in putting it up is assured by the Messrs. Atmore. Not a hand has occasion to touch the fruits or meats in the process of preparation, machinery performing the work, and this is steamed and washed thoroughly three times daily. The utmost care is taken, and the best articles are used. Their goods are sold all over the civilized world; a short time since they sent an invoice to Africa and one to South America.

THE policy upon which the ST. NICHOLAS is conducted is based upon giving patrons the full value and equivalent for their expenditures; and, considering the variety of the comforts and conveniences afforded, the excellence of the table, and accommodating spirit manifested by all, one becomes impressed with the idea that patrons of the old reliable ST. NICHOLAS receive more than full value for their money.

WE would recommend all to try DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE, as it is a Perfect Blood Purifier, Makes new Blood, Reddens old Blood, Enriches poor Blood, and Gives Vigorous Health. The dose is but one teaspoonful for an adult, and smaller in proportion for children, and it is exceedingly pleasant to take. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists. Price $0 cents and $1.

IF your complaint is want of appetite, try half a wineglass of ANGOSTURA BITTERS half an hour before dinner. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Rupture

DR. J. A. SHERMAN—AND THE ONLY DR. SHERMAN, known to the public for the past 35 years or more for his successful method of treating Rupture without the annoyance and injury trusses inflict—may be consulted at his office, St. Louis, Mo., until the 20th of December, after that at his New York office. His office address is in the St. Louis newspapers.

Mr. B. F. George, Attorney-at-Law, Kent, Union County, Iowa, treated by Dr. Sherman at his St. Louis office, writes: "Having used your Rupture treatment, and having been permanently cured, I have spoken highly of its merits and recommend it to my friends."

Dr. Sherman is the discoverer of the only known cure for Rupture by local external treatment.

No man is safe who has a Rupture, no matter how insignificant he may consider it, for every man who has died from it once faltered himself that it was but a trifling ailment; and every man who now suffers from it and the injury of trusses, to such an extent that life has no enjoyments, once regarded it as unworthy special attention. It is not a stand-still affection; it is steadily progressive, even unto death, and he is wise who takes the necessary steps to be effectually relieved of it before the day of suffering and gloom comes upon him.

Patients from abroad can receive treatment and leave for home same day. During treatment any kind of active exercise or labor can be performed without interfering with the treatment, and with safety from the dangers of strangulated Rupture. HIS BOOK ON RUPTURE gives the most reliable proofs from distinguished professional gentlemen, clergymen and merchants of his successful practice and popularity therefrom throughout this country and the West Indies. The afflicted should read it and inform themselves.

It is illustrated with photographic likenesses of extremely bad cases before and after cure, and mailed to those who send ten cents.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"This is one of the very best monthlies published for the family and home, and the annual subscription is low at $3 per year."—Nokomis (Ill.) Gazette.

"Once more we say it: this magazine surpasses any literary publication of the kind that we have ever seen."—Wilmington (N. C.) Presbyterian.

"If you have children, buy this magazine; if you have none, buy it also. It costs little, and teaches much in a pleasant way. One volume of it is a small library, embracing all subjects and all parts of the world, with fine illustrations that give an additional attraction to the text."—American, N. Y.

". . . Is alike remarkable for the abundance, vast variety and excellence of the contents, it every and artistic; and it may well cause surprise that it can be afforded at the low price of twenty five cents a copy, or three dollars per annum, post-free."—Central Methodist, Ky.

"The SUNDAY MAGAZINE is a very attractive publication for the family, both as to its illustrations and its reading-matter. It contains a great variety, and we hear it commended very warmly in families where it is taken."—The (Boston) Congregationalist.

". . . There is such an abundance of good things, literary and artistic, as to fully justify its claim to be considered the best and cheapest Sunday magazine published."—Pacific Christian Messenger.

"FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE, published at 55, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York, has always been, in our estimation, the very class of Sunday reading that is worthy of admission to every home circle and reading-room. It is profusely illustrated. It is conducted in a most able manner; the editor spares no toil to make it useful and pleasing to all. Our Christian Advocate recommends it as 'a magazine of sterling excellence.'"—Active Christian, Marietta, Pa.

KIDNEY-WORT
PERMANENTLY CURES KIDNEY DISEASES, LIVER COMPLAINTS,
Constipation and Piles.
Dr. R. H. Clark, South Hero, Vt., says, "In cases of Kidney Troubles it has acted like a charm. It has cured many very bad cases of Piles, and has never failed to act efficiently."
Nelson Fairchild, of St. Albans, Vt., says, "It is of priceless value. After sixteen years of great suffering from Piles and Costiveness it completely cured me."
C. K. Hopkins, of Berkshire says, "One package has done wonders for me in completely curing a severe Liver and Kidney Complaint."
IT HAS WONDERFUL POWER. WHY?
Because it acts on the LIVER, BOWELS and KIDNEYS at the same time.
Because it cleanses the system of the poisonous humors that develope in Kidney and Urinary Diseases, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Piles, or in Rheumatism, Neuralgia Nervous Disorders and Female Complaints.
☞ It is put up in Dry Vegetable Form, in tin cans, one package of which makes six quarts of medicine. Also in Liquid Form very Concentrated for those that cannot readily prepare it.
☞ It acts with equal efficiency in either form.
GET IT AT THE DRUGGISTS. PRICE, $1.00

Liquid KIDNEY-WORT
In response to the urgent requests of great numbers of people who prefer to purchase a Kidney-Wort already prepared, the proprietors of this celebrated remedy now prepare it in liquid form as well as dry. It is very concentrated, is put up in large bottles, and is equally efficient as that put up dry in tin cans. It saves the necessity of preparing, is always ready, and is more easily taken by most people. Price, $1 per bottle.

A PRESIDENTIAL PENSION FUND.

THERE is no apparent reason for distrusting the motives of those persons who have interested themselves in establishing a "Presidential Pension Fund" by means of popular subscriptions. The object is worthy, but the scope of such a fund and the method of securing it are open to many objections which are prompted neither by partisan feeling nor personal likes or dislikes. The scheme for the proposed fund includes only one beneficiary, the oldest ex-President of the United States living—oldest not as to age, but as to the length of time which he has been out of office. The fund is to be made up from individual contributions, and will in no sense be national in character. There is an obvious objection to this method of raising the fund in the fact that the subscriptions must, to a large extent, be dictated by the respect or the dislike entertained for the person who is to be the immediate beneficiary. Those who subscribe cannot avoid the feeling that they are contributing to the benefit of one whom they may delight in honoring, or whom they would prefer should not be benefited by their generosity. That the character, amount and diversity of the subscriptions will be largely influenced by these feelings and prejudices no one can doubt. On the other hand, the recipients of the trust, for some time at least, will occupy the position of debtors, or, worse still, perhaps, of charity wards of the contributors to the fund. If in no other way, certainly in the sense of being supported at the expense of a comparatively few individuals, the beneficiaries, during the lives of the subscribers, will feel that they occupy a false and delicate position. Were the proposed fund to be created out of an appropriation purely national, these objections would not exist, and those for whom it was established, while accepting with gratitude its benefits, would feel it to be a graceful recognition of their past services by an entire nation.

The strongest objections may be raised, however, against the scope of the fund—whether national or popular—as embraced in the present scheme. The object, as explained by the projectors, is to do honor to those who have occupied the highest official position in the gift of this country, and to preserve those whom the nation has dignified from contact with penury or want. This cannot be accomplished by the present plan. If the present were an infallible index of the future, the proposition to pension the oldest ex-President to the exclusion of his successors might indeed meet no objection. There is only one ex-President now living, and, therefore, there could be no injustice done immediately. After March 4th next there will be two ex-Presidents, unless the death of one should occur in the meantime. Perhaps if the same state of affairs were to continue for ever, as will exist after that date, even then no objection could be urged to the scheme in its present form.

But it would be too much to expect, and would be in opposition to past experience to predict, that the same relations which will exist in a few months will continue indefinitely. In fact, it is an exception in the history of this country that those relations should be in such full accord with the terms of the scheme which we are considering. Apply the plan to any other period, and in no instance will it be found that the beneficiary combined in himself the widest respect, the largest necessities and the greatest age. Had such a scheme been perfected at the time of the formation of the Government, there is good reason to believe that it would have been abandoned long ago, because of its manifest injustice. What the chances are of there never being more than two ex-Presidents surviving at the same time may be inferred from a glance at the past. From March 4th, 1797, when Washington became the first ex-President, to March 4th, 1881, a period of eighty-four years, it appears that for three years there was no ex-President living, caused by the death of Washington in one instance, and of Johnson in another. For sixteen years there was only one ex-President, nearly eleven years of which were filled by the first two ex-Presidents this country had—Washington and Adams. Four years of the remainder were filled by General Grant, leaving only a little more than one year besides when there was not more than one ex-President living, including the three years when there was none. The period may, therefore, be declared to be exceptional when there were less than two surviving ex-Presidents. For thirty years there were two, for twenty-eight years there were three, for six years there were four, and for one year there were five ex-Presidents living. During two-thirds of the entire period there were never less than two nor more than three survivors. It would be safe to predict that, if the history of the past is not to repeat itself, such changes as are likely to ensue will tend to increase the average number of Presidential survivors. Younger men are being called to the Presidency than in the early days of our history. Down to 1841 the youngest man who surrendered his seat was Van Buren, who was fifty-eight years of age when he retired, while the average age of the nine Presidents during the period was sixty-five years. Of the ten Presidents since that time one-half were less than fifty-six years of age at the time of their retirement, two of them only fifty-three years, while the average was only fifty-nine years.

How the plan of pensioning the oldest ex-President would have affected the Presidents of the past let the following summary show: Washington would have enjoyed the fund for nearly three years, his death occurring a little more than a year before his successor's term expired. John Adams would have been the next beneficiary, and for twenty-five years he would have been in receipt of the pension, to the exclusion of the three who succeeded him in office during his lifetime. Jefferson, who survived his office seventeen years, and who died on the same day as John Adams, would have been entirely excluded from the benefit of the fund, notwithstanding that he became so reduced that an Act was passed by the Legislature of Virginia authorizing him to dispose of his property by lottery for the purpose of providing means to pay his debts. The death of Jefferson alone prevented this measure from being carried out. Madison survived his office nineteen years, but would have enjoyed the fund only ten years. Monroe would have received no benefit during his survivorship of six years, the fund being enjoyed by Adams and Madison during the period. John Quincy Adams would have been the fourth beneficiary, and he would have excluded entirely Andrew Jackson, who survived eight years, although he himself would have been in receipt of the pension for only twelve years out of the nineteen years which he lived. Van Buren would have been the next, and would have kept the fund fourteen years out of the twenty-one years he survived, excluding absolutely Tyler, who lived seventeen years, and Polk, who lived three months after retirement from office. Fillmore, the next reversioner, survived twenty-one years, and would have enjoyed the fund twelve years, causing the exclusion of Pierce, who survived twelve years, and Buchanan, who lived seven years after surrendering office. Andrew Johnson would have enjoyed the trust only one year, and, after a lapse of the trust for about two years, General Grant would have been the beneficiary for four years.

Thus it appears that of the fifteen Presidents who retired from office—three having died during their Presidential term—only eight would have received any benefit from a fund provided in the manner now proposed. Those eight would have received the pension for an aggregate period of eighty years, while for thirty-seven years they would have been deprived of it. The seven who would have been excluded from the pre-supposed generosity represented an aggregate survivorship of sixty-nine years, making an aggregate of 106 years entirely unprovided for. If such would have been the result of the adoption, one hundred years ago, of such a scheme as is now proposed, there is little reason to anticipate any better or more satisfactory result for the future. If the scheme would have excluded the Jeffersons, Monroes and Jacksons of the past, why might it not exclude those of the future? If it happens for the present to include the honored and sole ex-President now living, it is more than likely to happen that some Jefferson or Jackson, or, perhaps, a Lincoln or a Grant, may be deprived of the benefits which it is thought to secure for them exclusively. The plan, whether private or public, whether popular or national, needs modification before final adoption.

THE NEGRO AND SOUTHERN PROGRESS.

WE referred in a recent issue to the marked growth of some of the Southern States, and notably of South Carolina, in population and the essential elements of substantial business prosperity. The population of South Carolina, as was shown in that reference, has grown in ten years from 705,606 to 995,306, an increase of forty-one per cent., which is very much larger than the average rate for the country as a whole. Of this increase, it may be added, 101,404 is in the white population, and 188,421 in the colored, or, putting the fact in another form, the increase of the whites has been 35 per cent., and of the blacks 45.31 per cent.

These figures appear the more remarkable when it is remembered that South Carolina, during at least half the period covered by the late census, has been generally regarded as in a peculiarly distressing condition, its fields waste, its property-owners ruined by excessive taxation, its enterprise paralyzed by misrule, and its colored population compelled to seek in other States a refuge from political oppression and the horrors of starvation. But taking the census returns as evidence upon this point, the fact appears to be that during this period the class which was supposed to be suffering most severely from adverse influences has increased its numbers by nearly one-half. Commenting upon this general subject, the Commercial Bulletin draws these conclusions, which seem to us at once just and instructive:

"During the decade ending with 1860, the white race in South Carolina was increasing more rapidly than the colored, the gain in the former being 6.66 per cent. and in the latter 4.66 per cent.; whereas, during the last ten years, the comparison is reversed, the colored having gained very considerably upon the white. It is impossible to evade the conclusion to be drawn from these facts as to the effects of the abrogation of slavery. Instead of the colored race proving to be unable to take care of themselves and decaying in the absence of the supervision of white ownership, their emancipation has been followed by an amazing development of fecundity and growth, suggestive of new reflections as to the possible destiny and importance of the negro race on this continent. This at least is the moral of the figures for this one State, and we know of no special reason for regarding South Carolina as exceptional to the South at large; on the contrary, complaints of the sufferings of the negro have been more general from this State than any other. There is no possibility of accounting for this progress from any local causes, such as a development of trade at the commercial cities, for the following comparison of population at the chief cities, in 1880 and 1870, will show the progress in these localities has not equaled the ratio for the State at large:

	1880.		1870.
Beaufort	7,605	..	7,250
Charleston City	49,999	..	48,956
Charleston County	122,835	..	88,863
Georgetown	6,666	..	5,500
Columbia City	10,040	..	9,298

The gain has occurred, for the main part, in the agriculture of the State, which is almost entirely dependent on the colored population; and this fact shows how little faith is to be put in the stories of white oppression in South Carolina, how well able the negro is to hold his own against white competition, and how little he needs the solicitude that is lavished upon him in other sections."

COMBINATIONS IN FINANCE.

A NOTICEABLE incident in the recent convention of the representatives of the insurance interest was the warmth of the reception given to a resolution advocating the cultivation of a fraternal spirit among underwriters, to the end of securing co-operation in business. Such a resolution was exceedingly timely. The world has been too long in discovering that a man will never find his best road to success over the prostrate form of his neighbor. The scalping process in trade, the practice of over-reaching, the method of building up great establishments on the ruins of those of less fortunate competitors, must yield to a more liberal and intelligent conception of financial morals; and it is to hoped that the day is not far distant when men will be prepared to recognize their higher obligations. Theoretically, the world is making reasonable progress. Practically, where selfishness intrudes to blunt the sense of duty and competition places every man in peril, we move with slower footsteps. But we move, and the signs of the times indicate a new mode of motion. Together, men are learning to marching more steadily and with greater directness.

A business failure is never defensible. The bankrupt himself may be guiltless of any intentional offence, but the iniquity lies at the door of that imperfect social organization which has rendered the catastrophe possible. No man is permanently benefited by permitting disasters to overtake his rival. The fall of a single joint-stock company, of a corporation or of an individual, is a loss to the entire community. The man who imagines that he can derive more than a temporary and doubtful benefit by the removal of a competitor is a shallow philosopher and a worse citizen. The disorders in society incidental to panics and bankruptcies reach the highest as well as the lowest in grade, and the difference in suffering is only in degree. A fraternal spirit in business, expressing itself in good works, would bring to all men the peace that comes with perfect security, and benefit the strong as well as the weak.

But security can be reached only through organization. There is neither good-fellowship nor religion that can hold men to a sense of their obligations: and charity will be best observed when it is made, fundamentally, a factor in finance. General banking, insurance and trade reserves, held within the reach of corporations and individuals, will be alone the medium through which a fraternal spirit in business can express itself, and organization must be looked to as the only vehicle that can carry such a beneficent burden.

It is a sign of promise when so powerful a body of financiers as those who make up the underwriters' convention deliberately consider the desirableness of co-operation in business. Insurance men have especial reasons for union. In a country favored with so many large and combustible cities as the United States they have everything to prompt and quicken their intelligence. Possibly their present organization comprehends no other purpose than a general purification of the atmosphere, the elimination of unworthy and reckless competitors who adventure into business with insufficient capital, the suppression of fraud, and security against what they conceive to be unjust and discriminating legislation. These are valid excuses for organization; but the duties of the underwriters will not end with such partial reforms. The public wants protection against the failure of even the most substantial insurance companies when a great conflagration has burdened them with losses beyond their resources; and the managers of those institutions will study their own best interests when they so extend the object of their organization that they can furnish the security required. In such a work they will be doing both themselves and the public a better service than when, in a spirit of doubtful liberality, they contend against the methods of taxation adopted by the States.

Our bankers, too, can find a field for philosophical speculation not yet explored, but in which the banking system can secure a foundation more solid than any to be found in Acts of Congress or the Government. They are more directly responsible for the financial stability of the country than any other class of business men. They can spread general ruin by failure; and it would be no new incident were a commercial panic to be precipitated on the business community at any time by a panic among bankers. Such an event would not be so rare as to be phenomenal; and it is strange that the world has so long submitted to methods in bank management that can be productive of such destructive consequences. Here, especially, is a field where the cultivation of a fraternal spirit among business men, and the adoption of a system of co-operation, would be productive of the most signal benefits. Bank failures should be rendered impossible. General banking reserves, sufficient to meet every exigency, should be instituted, and in this system protection against panic would be found to lie directly in the pathway to greater economy and thrift. It is no good method in finance that adventures the last dollar in speculation, and trusts more to Providence than to prudence for good results.

A GREAT RAILWAY SCHEME.

ANOTHER gigantic railroad combination is outlined in the newspapers. By a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, which extends from Kansas City and St. Louis through the Indian Territory to Dennison, Texas, where it has connections to Austin, San Antonio and Galveston on the Gulf of Mexico, has fallen into the hands of Jay Gould and his syndicate. It is now proposed to consolidate with this road the Missouri Pacific and the Texas Pacific, with their various branches and feeders, which, if the Central and Union Pacific can be brought into the arrangement, will enable Mr. Gould and his associates to practically control the railways of the entire continent west of the Mississippi and south—by means of concessions from Mexico—into the very heart of that Republic. The capital stock of the Missouri, Kansas and Pacific was last week increased twenty-five millions of dollars for the purpose of building the new roads necessary to the completion of the system. The consolidation proposed will make a system aggregating 5,214 miles of road in present operation, with an indefinite number of miles still to be built, and reaching in the main from Toledo and Chicago on the lakes to San Francisco, Mexico City, and by way of the Texas and Pacific from New Orleans to the Pacific Coast, with hundreds of lateral feeders running through all the most desirable regions of the West and South. It is hinted that General Grant will be placed at the head of the new combination, but this is yet a matter of conjecture only. There is no doubt a wide field for railway enterprise in the development of the immense natural resources of Mexico and the Southwest, and any scheme looking to that result will enlist popular sympathy, but the concentration of the management of so vast an interest in a single corporation will be regarded by very few as in the line of sound public policy.

The movement in New York City in aid of Mexican development is rapidly assuming shape, and seems likely to enlist the co-operation of many leading capitalists here and elsewhere. General Grant heads the committee which is charged with the task of organizing the enterprise.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE gravity of the situation in Ireland has increased during the last week. The tactics which were adopted to compel Lord Erne's agent, Mr. Boycott, to leave the country have proved unsuccessful, and the Government have preserved law and order, but at such an expense that it will be impossible to relieve all other landlords in a similar manner. The Land Leaguers see this and have openly declared that they will "Boycott" some 2,000 landlords before Christmas. As the whole force of the British army would not be sufficient to protect these landlords, the Government will be obliged to have recourse to other measures. Foremost among these is a proposal to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. As this suspension should only be resorted to when all legal remedies have failed, the more radical members of the Cabinet have expressed themselves as strongly averse to it. Mr. Bright and Mr. Chamberlin have both spoken in public and announced their determination to oppose a suspension by every means in their power. Indeed, it is almost certain that both these Ministers would resign if the Cabinet resolved to suspend the Act. It is announced, however, that at present no such variance of opinion exists between members of the Cabinet as to justify the supposition that any Ministers contemplate the necessity of retiring. As Mr. Gladstone's owes his present position to the support which the Radical wing of the Liberal Party gave him at the last election, it is not likely that any measure which the Birmingham Party do not approve will be passed. On the other hand, the great Whig houses, represented by such men as Lord Hartington, insist upon the protection of property. The greatest strength of the Liberal Party lies among the landed gentry, and these persons are naturally in favor of guarding the rights of the landlords. Mr. Gladstone is, therefore, in a dilemma between the two divisions, and this entanglement probably accounts for the want of energy that the Government has shown during the Irish troubles. It is worth remarking that the English Radicals, no matter how advanced their ideas may be, are dead against any separation of England and Ireland, and are just as strongly opposed to the revolutionary spirit of the Land Leaguers as the most downright Tory in the land. Lord Selborne, the Lord Chancellor, is in favor of an immediate suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, thinking that no measures of redress should be introduced until law and order are vindicated. It is said that the Government have a scheme ready against the meeting of Parliament. This project would include a change in the land tenure and the purchase by the State of certain lands upon which a peasant proprietary might be tried.

The stormy scenes which marked the opening of the French Chambers still continue. The decrees against the religious Orders, and the manner in which they have been carried out, give an unending subject for discussion and vituperation. The Vatican has taken the somewhat unusual step of denouncing all the police officials who helped to put the decrees into effect. In the Senate M. Buffet has made an interpellation as to the crisis which resulted in the resignation of M. de Freycinet and the formation of the present Ministry. He expressed a strong belief that the expulsion of the religious Orders was merely an excuse for the fall of Freycinet, and that the real cause of his fall was the disapproval which he openly expressed of Gambetta's famous anti-Prussian speech at Cherbourg. This brought M. Ferry, the Premier, to his feet, and he absolutely denied M. Buffet's accusations. He went on to accuse the various Monarchical parties of siding with the religious bodies, and of opposing the laws to an extent that amounted almost to a veritable rebellion. He also charged them with bribing the police officials with money and the promise of advancement if they would refuse to carry out the decrees. One of the Legitimists then asked whether there was not some occult power behind the Cabinet, and whether Gambetta had not compelled the Ministry to retract what they had before approved. The insinuation raised an uproar in the House, but upon a division the Government were victorious by a small majority—143 to 137. The prosecutions of the Press still continue, and the managers of La Commune has been sentenced in default to fifteen months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of 2,000 francs for defending a criminal act. The director of La Civilisation has also been sentenced in contumacium to three months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of 2,000 francs for insulting the President, the Tribunal of Conflicts and the Council of State.

From Spain comes the news that the Government has given all the Cuban revolutionary leaders their liberty. It is understood that the arrangement was made with Calixto Garcia, and that measures will be taken to remove the grievances of which Cuba has such just cause to complain. A large mass meeting was held in Madrid under the auspices of the Co-operative Trade Association in favor of reform in the tariff not only in Spain, but also in the colonies. It is proposed to promote trade with England and with South America, and by this means promote the prosperity of Cuba, freeing her from being a monopoly market for Spanish products. The question will also be strenuously advocated in the Cortes by the opposition. The movement seems to be far-reaching; and it is also proposed to refund the national debt into a three per cent. stock. Such a conversion would save the country fifteen millions a year. The Minister of Finance has the subject in hand, and it is likely that some scheme will be laid before the Cortes.

The Pope has appointed Cardinal Jacobini as Pontifical Secretary in the place of Cardinal Nina. It is generally thought that this appointment will be followed by a change in the policy of the Vatican. The Pope approves of the conduct of the Irish Bishops, and he will probably issue a letter to that effect. The dispute between the Vatican and Russia in reference to the vacant Polish Sees has been amicably arranged, and appointments will be at once made. In making these appointments the Pope will consider the claims of any persons recommended by the Russian Government.

A curious marriage took place recently. Prince Roland Napoleon, the son of Pierre Napoleon, who shot Victor Noir, was united to Mlle. Blanc, the second daughter of the late proprietor of the gaming establishment at Monte Carlo. The bridegroom is a sub-lieutenant in the Thirty-sixth Regiment of French Infantry, and, as his father is third in the true Bonapartist succession, it is not altogether impossible that the daughter of the great gambler may sit upon the throne of France.

THE Governor of Louisiana has appointed T. C. Manning, ex-Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of that State, as United States Senator, vice Spofford, deceased. This is probably to be accepted as indicating a purpose to renew the attempt to unseat Senator Kellogg, which it had been supposed would be abandoned with the death of the long-baffled contestant. The attempt, however seriously made, is not likely to succeed, several leading Democratic Senators being positively committed against it.

IT appears that both Garfield and Hancock have carried California—the former by 507 majority, and the latter by 143. That is to say, one Garfield Elector has the majority first named, while the majority for the five Democratic Electors have majorities ranging from 87 to 143. The beaten Democratic Elector, David S. Terry, is the man who forced Broderick into a duel and then killed him for opposing the pro-slavery policy of the Southern leaders in California. The only wonder is that he was not beaten overwhelmingly.

HANLAN now fairly ranks as the champion sculler of the world, his defeat of Trickett in the great match on the Thames, last week, having left him without a real rival. Probably a greater amount of money was staked on the issue of this race than has ever been raked on any similar event. It is believed that nearly two millions of dollars changed hands in this country and England on the result. One Australian, who came here especially to bet on the race, lost $50,000, while ten times that amount is believed to have been lost by persons who were influenced by his betting and supposed knowledge of Trickett's capacity. In London many sporting characters from Australia, who bet everything on their countryman, were left penniless and will have to be sent home at the expense of their friends. They probably have a profounder respect for American brawn and muscle than they have ever had before.

IN the re-election of Hon. Joseph E. Brown as United States Senator from Georgia, the Bourbon element of the Democratic Party has suffered another notable defeat. He received the votes of all the Republicans in the Legislature, and his election has been hailed with genuine satisfaction by the more liberal Democrats in all parts of the State. A rumor that he will act in harmony with the Republicans of the Senate is no doubt without foundation in fact, but that he will refuse to co-operate with the reactionary influences of his party may be regarded as certain. In a recent interview he declared himself in favor of the liberal education of the blacks, and of their admission to official employments, adding: "I expect to aid some of them in getting office, in preference to some white men." Further on he said: "I accepted the constitutional amendments and reconstruction measures in good faith. I mean to abide by them in good faith. We have a new South. The world moves; I am going to move with it."

THERE are indications of an unusual number of contests for disputed seats in the next Congress. Fourteen are already definitely announced, including two from Alabama, two from Louisiana, two from Missouri, four from South Carolina, two from Virginia, and two from Mississippi. It is thought that nearly as many more cases, making twenty-eight in all, will come before the House, and that in a good many instances, Republicans will be seated in place of Democrats. In some cases this may turn out to be just and proper, owing to fraud, intimidation or irregularities in the election; but any arbitrary use of their power by the Republican majority, merely for partisan ends, will certainly result in ultimate injury to the party. The people demand honesty and fair play in our elections, but they demand also that the rights of minorities shall be sacredly respected, and that the mere possession of power shall not be held to warrant its use for any purpose, however disreputable or dangerous.

MR. ABRAM S. HEWITT does not appear to advantage in the matter of the Chinese letter forgery. He appears to have been more anxious to bolster up the fraud by which the leaders of his party proposed to get an advantage, than to maintain the reputation he has enjoyed as a just, upright and manly man. How could he, claiming to be General Garfield's "friend," rush in and declare the letter to be genuine when the alleged writer had twice branded it as a forgery? What sort of friendship is that which deliberately lends its sanction, and gives respectability to, a base attempt to injure the good name of a confidential correspondent and official associate? Mr. Hewitt, as the Sun remarks, "has fallen into very disgraceful company," and he will have to dip in the Jordan of cleansing a good many times before the mire of his foul association is wholly washed away. But while this is said, it is equally true that Judge Davis has not commended himself to public favor by his gratuitously partisan arraignment of Mr. Hewitt, in a formal judicial opinion from the Bench. It is just this sort of intemperate violation of all the official proprieties that brings the judiciary into contempt, and so seriously impairs its rightful influence as a conservator of sacred interests.

THE spirit of proscription is not yet, apparently, extinct in South Carolina. A Democratic organization in Greenville County, in that State, has just adopted resolutions pledging the members not to rent their lands to, or employ, or allow any one renting their lands to employ, any "Radicals," white or black, and calling upon all citizens and merchants to fill with Democrats all places now occupied by persons of an opposite political faith. Furthermore, this organization resolves:

"That we discountenance any man who will violate any of the above resolutions and consider him wanting in loyalty to his party, and spot him as an enemy to good government.

"That any voter, a stranger to us, who may apply to us for employment, must produce satisfactory papers that he is a Democrat."

It is difficult to conceive of any form of ostracism or proscription more odious than that here proposed, and we are glad to see that the leading Democratic journal of South Carolina, the Charleston News, condemns the proposal as it deserves. The South can never recover its just influence in the Government of the country so long as it harbors this spirit of intimidation and violent interference with the freedom of opinion, and the sooner its representative men shall unite in the suppression everywhere of a tendency so full of menace to individual rights and the public tranquility, the better it will be for the cause of sound administration and the interests of the people of all sections.

THE schools for enlisted men of the Army, which have been in operation for two or three years past at the different military posts, appear to have so far demonstrated their usefulness as to justify a material enlargement of their facilities. General A. McD. McCook, who is charged with the direction of these schools, in his annual report, urges that, with a view of increasing the efficiency of the schools, men should be enlisted as schoolmasters, and assigned to duty at the various posts, where they could instruct not only the soldiers but the children who are found about nearly every post, and who have no educational privileges except such as they find at home, or in the post school. He recommends also that post libraries should be supplied for the benefit of the enlisted men. He strongly insists that, with the improvement in firearms, it has become absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the Army that its rank and file shall be made up of more intelligent men. As a rule "men must have some knowledge of projectiles before they can use modern breech-loaders effectively, must be able on the skirmish line to distinguish between a bullet proof cover and a concealing cover, and must generally possess a degree of intelligence which can only be acquired by some mental discipline." Whether this opinion is or is not well founded, there can be no question as to the value of these post schools, and Congress could not act amiss in making early provision for their improvement.

A GOOD deal of speculation is indulged in as to the probable relations which the Republican "stalwarts" will hold to General Garfield's Administration. It is insisted by many Democratic journals that the Conkling-Logan influence will undoubtedly be dominant, and that the President-elect, in pursuance of a compact made before the election, will permit himself and the Government to be "run" by this faction according to their own sweet will. We venture to predict that this insistment will turn out to be altogether unfounded. As a matter of fact, General Garfield will enter upon his duties as President absolutely free from all pledges and entanglements of whatever sort. More nearly than any recent President, he will represent the best influences and highest impulses of the whole Republican Party, but without being under peculiar obligations to any element or faction of it, and his innate strength and independence of character constitute a solid guarantee that he will administer his high office with a broad reference to the interests of all rather than to the clamors of a few. Undoubtedly, the "stalwarts" will receive consideration, but it will be upon the same basis that the conservatives are considered, and neither will be able to substitute their wishes or their conclusions for those of the Executive himself. Mr. Hayes made the mistake of repelling the radicals by setting up to be wiser and more righteous than they were, and he was two years or more in learning that the ends he had proposed to himself by this course were impossible of attainment. General Garfield, a grander man in every way, but with a more moderate estimate of his abilities, will not commit this serious blunder; but, on the other hand, he will maintain that robust independence which, conceding to all others their fullest rights, surrenders no essential individual conviction and abdicates no rightful prerogative for the sake, or at the demand, of mere expediency.

REV. ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D.,

THE Rev. Dr. Roswell Dwight Hitchcock, who was unanimously elected as the successor of the late Rev. Dr. William Adams in the presidency of Union Theological Seminary, on November 9th, has long been well known as the Professor of Church History in that institution, and as one of our most profound as well as prolific theological writers.

Dr. Hitchcock was born, August 15th, 1817, at East Machias, Me. He was a student at Amherst College, and was graduated in 1836. For some time he was a tutor in the college, and subsequently he was a teacher in Phillips Academy, at Andover, Mass. He attended the Andover Theological Seminary, and in November, 1845, was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in Exeter, N. H., where he remained until 1852. One of the years during his pastorate of the church was spent in study in Germany. In 1852 he was appointed Professor of Natural and Revealed Religion in Bowdoin College, and in 1853 he was appointed to the chair of Church History in the Union Theological Seminary.

Dr. Hitchcock is the author of "A Complete Analysis of the Bible," which was published in 1869, and of a small work entitled "Socialism," published in 1878. Many of his sermons and addresses have been published, and he has contributed a number of essays to different reviews. From 1863 to 1870 he was one of the editors of The American Theological Review. In 1866 he visited Greece and Italy, and during 1869-70 he traveled through Palestine and Egypt. He was chosen President of the Palestine Exploration Society in 1871. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Bowdoin College in 1855, and in 1869 he was made a trustee of Amherst College. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him by Williams College in 1873.

During the war of the rebellion, Dr. Hitchcock was an earnest supporter of the Government.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

THE mother sits at the open door,
She hummeth a low, sweet tune,
And rocks her babe asleep on her breast
In the drowsy Summer noon.
"He cometh, my darling," she softly sings,
"To thee and to me again,
Or ever, perchance, on our golden fields
They carry the shining grain.
O happy moments! O sweet delay!
Though I start at every sound,
'Twill be to-morrow, if not to-day,
For they say he is homeward bound.

The ship sails on, but one precious life
They leave 'neath the deep dark main,
While far away on those golden fields
They carry the shining grain.
The mother sits at the open door,
She rocks her babe on her breast;
But the throbbing heart has grown weary now,
And longs to be at rest.
Yet still she murmurs the old sweet lay
While the sunlight fades around,
"'Twill be to-morrow, if not to-day,
For I know he was homeward bound!"

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

ONCE upon a time, a long while ago, there was a young girl, the daughter of an army officer, General Thomas Thurlow. Cecil Thurlow was the very prettiest girl in all the Point. Pearls and diamonds did not exactly come out of her mouth, but her eyes were like stars, and each time she opened her rosy lips she showed a row of little teeth whiter than any pearls, while her complexion was better than any amount of blanc de perle and poudre de Nivon could either make yours or mine.

General Thomas Thurlow set great store by his pretty daughter. He kept her under his own eye, well guarded from ravening wolves in the shape of the young cadets and the lieutenants who haunted the house and made the general's life a burden to him; he held them in as much abhorrence as Miss Trotwood held donkeys. The situation was becoming too much for him, so he took into friendly counsel an old crony (people said she had been an old love of his) and asked a word of advice.

"I have only one to give," said Madame Snuffin. "Marry her to my son Tumley."

"God bless my soul! I never thought of that!" answered the general, staring hard at the old lady.

"Men seldom think of what's under their nose. Tumley has adored Cecil all his life; he is ten years older, has a fine income—he'll have more at my death."

"But, Tumley—are you sure about him? He's said nothing to me."

"But he has to Cecil. Your girl is a coquette, general; she trifles with my boy and won't give him an answer. I think you had best take the matter into your own hands; it would be a pity if we couldn't be happy in our children, general."

"It will make up for the way you broke my heart," said the general, with old-fashioned gallantry, but he was evidently nonplussed. He went home with a grave face. "I can't believe my girl will take him; Tumley is an exceedingly good fellow, but he's not what women fancy."

He certainly was not. A tall, ungainly-looking man of thirty, with a long thin face, straight black hair, an awkward mouth, and a hesitating manner; his eyes were his best feature; they were good, kind, brown eyes, honest and true, and they lit up a face which his warmest friend must have called ugly.

He was using these eyes to some purpose when the general got home; he was pleading his cause with Cecil, and love made him eloquent. It is not the first time Cupid made the dumb speak.

"God Almighty save us! the man won't let any one have a word but himself!" moaned the general, as Tumley poured out his tale. The floodgates of passion were let loose with a vengeance.

"And what does my darling say?" and he took the girl in his arms.

"What would you like, papa?" she whispered.

"It would ease my mind to see you happily settled, my pet. If your old father's taken from you, what's to become of you?"

Cecil clung closer.

"I shall never be so happy as I have been with you, pappy."

"I don't suppose you will, my child. But Tumley's an excellent fellow; I can intrust you to him in all security, and he'll never separate you from me."

This argument prevailed. Cecil lifted her bright eyes from the general's shoulder and turned them on her lover. She began to laugh.

"You must cut your hair, Tumley; it's much too long. And you are not to interfere with my waltzing and flirting just a little; and, if you are very good and not a bit cross or disagreeable, and if your mother never speaks on the subject—well, I'll give you an answer this day six months."

It was no use—prayers and pleadings would get nothing more; and with this Tumley was fain to be content. He had one gratification—his princess allowed him to give her a bouquet every day. She also rode a splendid blood mare, which he had trained expressly for her, and occasionally allowed him the privilege of lifting her into the saddle; otherwise, she treated him worse than the youngest cadet. She laughed at him unmercifully, teased him beyond the limits of human patience, drove him frantic with jealousy, and vented all her girlish caprices upon him; it would seem as if she were trying to disgust him; but, if so, it was labor lost. Tumley bowed meekly before his tormentor; the worse she behaved, the more he adored her. It was a species of insanity, his mother said, and no doubt it appeared so.

One day he asked her to ride out to his place. She hadn't been there for years, and he wished to show it to her. Cecil tossed her head when he spoke of it as her future home, but she agreed to come.

It was a lovely Summer day, and the old place looked its best, with the sun shining through the trees and casting shadows from the broad oaks across the home park. It was, doubtless, a pleasant offering to lay at any woman's feet, and Cecil felt a throb of natural pride as she cast her eyes over the domain waiting to call her mistress, and saw the servants bowing before her and Tumley standing on the steps to bid her welcome. But a cloud came over his face when he saw that she had brought with her a couple of silly girls and a little train of her and their admirers. It was not well done, he felt, but he showed no annoyance. He would not hurt her by any coldness to her friends, and by-and-by they took to their own devices.

"It was a shame to tease old Tumley—such a good fellow!" they said; so they scattered through the place, and got themselves out of the way one by one, and left the two alone. Then he took her into the garden, not the new-fashioned one, the gardener's delight and pride, where the beds were all in symmetrical order and the range of green-houses and forcing-houses, guarded like some Eastern harem the rare plants within. But beyond this lay the old-fashioned garden within four walls; you entered it through a primitive green door. Here the roses clustered thickly over the walls, and there were whole trees of verbena, and hedges of sweetbrier, and square little beds partitioned off with box, full of stocks, and gilliflowers, and shepherd's purses, and all the sweet scented flowers our grandmothers loved to water and care for themselves. Cecil gave a little cry of pleasure. She drew a deep breath and her eyes met Tumley's with a soft look in their violet depths.

"I like this!" she said, simply. "It reminds me—yes, it is the old garden we used to play in long ago."

"Where I used to call you my little wife," Tumley answered, gravely, as they went up the straight walk together and paused at the old-fashioned sundial where the rays of sun cast a truth-telling shadow across the broad path. "I brought you here, Cecil, that you might give me my answer. The six months are out to-day."

Miss Thurlow grew very pale. She had been holding up the skirt of her riding-dress and showing her dainty feet, but she dropped it quickly, and counted on her fingers. What he said was true.

"I don't want to make a point in my own favor, but I must tell you, Cecil, your father is an embarrassed man. The bank in which all his savings had accumulated has failed, and there are the boys to be provided for. In such an important step as marriage money ought to be the last consideration. Much as I love you, I would not take your dear hand in mine knowing that you were in any way influenced, and therefore I have placed a sum of money in your name equivalent to your father's loss. Here is the script; it is my first wedding-gift, if so be you can like me a little; if not, it is a free gift from your oldest and most loving friend."

Cecil was moved. She put her hand in his.

"I should be most ungrateful if I did not like you; you deserve a far better wife than I shall ever be; however——" The rest of the sentence was lost, but no doubt the finish was equally satisfactory.

As they were leaving the garden Tumley asked his fiancée to give him a rose. "I shall keep it till my dying day," he said, "as a memento of the happiest moment in my life."

Cecil gave the rose, but she sighed a little as she did so.

So it was all settled, and every one was pleased but the mammas who wanted the rich young man for their daughters and the daughters who wished to sit at the head of his table. They had a great many unkind things to say, and one young lady of mature years who boasted a sarcastic tongue christened the pair "Beauty and the Beast." Cecil was very indignant when this pleasantry reached her, but Tumley only laughed. "I shall never change into a handsome prince." He was too happy to be angry, and he had too little vanity to take a joke like this to heart.

By and-by an invitation came for Cecil from a married cousin living in New York. She had pertinaciously ignored the girl, but now that she was blowing into a rich matron she became most cordial. Cecil, however, elected to accept the proffered kindness; she had her trousseau to buy, and the invitation came à propos. Tumley grew a little thoughtful when he heard of the acceptance, but he couldn't give himself airs like other lovers, so he acquiesced and Cecil went away rejoicing.

The cousin, Mrs. Crawshaw, kept a gay house. Young men came and went, and there was a perpetual round of pleasure. The wedding clothes progressed slowly; never was there a trousseau so long a-choosing. Tumley sank very much into the background. Each day there came a letter and a bouquet. The letter was not always answered, the flowers were seldom worn. Cecil had found another lover.

Colonel William Montague was the handsomest man in the city by long chalks; splendidly handsome, delightfully nonchalant, with a face with a story in it, Cecil said. This remark was repeated to the colonel by Mrs. Crawshaw and it pleased him. The next time he saw the girl he took notice of her—a deviation from his usual rôle, by which he confined his attentions to married women. They grew to be friends. The colonel heard her story from herself, and it gave him a languid interest; he played off all his tricks upon her, and Cecil, flirt as she was, was caught in the same trap in which she had taken so many. She believed the sighs and the innuendoes; the hand pressures which conveyed so much and meant so little; the songs that breathed a love he was too wise to put into prose. For a few weeks Cecil lived in a sort of delirium, and then came the awakening.

One night they were at the opera, Cecil and the colonel, side by side; she wore his flowers, while poor Tumley's reposed in a vase at home; he was whispering, she listening. What he said might have been published the next day for all to read, it was so thoroughly innocent; but he looked volumes. He bent his dark eyes upon her and leant over her chair, and comported himself in the fashion of a favored lover. Suddenly Cecil drew back. Two kind eyes had met hers, and the reproach, the sad despair, in them struck her like a blow.

"It is Tumley!" she said, in an awed voice. But the eyes had disappeared, and, search as she would for them, they were not to be seen. The pleasure of the evening was gone.

That night Cecil slept very little. A grave seemed to have opened under her feet. Whenever sleep came to her all the sad eyes were there looking reproachfully at her. She got up tired, harassed, out of sorts. She felt sorry to think she had to go to a lawn-party that day, and yet she would meet the colonel.

Mrs. Crawshaw was a little put out.

"Here is a letter from Colonel Montague, excusing himself. He is going West. Did he say anything to you last night?"

"No," said Cecil, faintly.

"Don't look as if you were going to drop." Her cousin was a little blunt when she was annoyed. "I hope you have not lost your heart to him. He is not a marrying man."

"You forget I am engaged," said Cecil.

"Upon my word, you don't seem to remember it yourself, sometimes," answered her cousin.

Cecil's head was so bad that when the time came for starting she couldn't go. As her faithful chronicler, I am inclined to think she remained more in the hope that Colonel Montague would call to say good-by—she couldn't believe he would go away in that fashion. She kept watch all through that long Summer's day; she could do nothing but walk from the clock to the window and back again; but no one came. The day waned, the shadows lengthened, the milk cart went its rounds, the lamps were lit, there was no more hope. About nine o'clock a loud ring drove all the blood to her heart. She stood up, listening anxiously; the door opened, and a telegram was handed to her by the butler. Cecil's hand trembled so she could not hold it. She gave it to the respectable functionary, who read it without a tremor in his voice:

"From Mrs. Scuffin to Miss Cecil Thurlow.

"Tumley is dying. Come at once if you wish him to die in peace."

With a loud scream the poor girl fell back, but she did not faint. She collected herself in a few minutes, and amazed the respectable butler by her promptness.

"She was admirable. He'd never seen such a lady," he said, in speaking afterwards on the event of the evening.

In half an hour she was ready to start; in three hours she was at home. In spite of all things the sight of her home gave her the first pleasant feeling she had had for days.

"Papa will make it all right," she thought. But the general was not at home; that accounted for his not sending the telegram. So she went to Mrs. Snuffin, late as it was.

The old lady received her with fierce politeness.

"You do us too much honor," she said, "in coming to the house of sickness. A fashionable lady like you, with so many lovers! Why didn't you let my boy alone?" she went on, turning to Cecil with fury. "Would nothing suit but my only son, that you should take his heart and break it at your pleasure—his noble heart! Oh, may God punish you as you deserve! May the curse——"

But at this moment the bell rang up-stairs and she hurried away. Cecil would have been indignant, only she was so utterly worn out and crushed. The house was as silent as the grave, no sound save the ticking of the clocks—it was unbearable. She stole up-stairs softly and sat down on the staircase. Presently she heard a little whining snuffle, and Crib, poor Tumley's dog, came smelling about her; his wet nose seemed like a friend's greetings. She took him in her arms and, laying her head upon his rough coat, burst out crying. She was still sobbing when the door of the sick-room softly opened, and Jennings, old lady Snuffin's factotum, came out, treading, as it were, upon eggshells. She nearly fell over Cecil.

"Dear heart! Miss Cecil, how you frightened me!"

"How is he, Jennings? Oh, dear Jennings! it's not true that he is dying?" And, as the woman turned away, she clung to her, repeating the same words mechanically.

"Don't take on so, deary; sure it was all along of his love for you. I never saw its equal; it was worship—just that and no mistake; he never raised his head from the day you left."

"But it wasn't that altogether, Jennings; there must have been something else." Conscience pricked her wofully; the remembrance of the unanswered letters, the discarded flowers rushed like accusing angels to her mind.

"The doctor said it was fever," Jennings continued, "and that he was to be kept quiet; but the day before yesterday he would go to town. His mother and I were glad. "He'll see Miss Cecil," we said, "and that will cheer him up a bit;" but he came back as if he had been struck for death. He has raved all day and night, and it is now the fever is leaving him when he is dying."

Just then the door of the sick-room opened, and some one called to Jennings.

"That's for you, miss; the master wants you."

"I can't go," said the girl, shuddering. She felt like his murderer.

"There is nothing to startle you; he is as quiet as a lamb, poor gentleman! Surely you wouldn't grudge him a last look at you?"

The mother passed out as Cecil entered. She and her lover were alone. It was true what Jennings had said—there was nothing startling. He lay back in an armchair. He was deadly pale, but the kind eyes lit up like lamps the dying face, and the love that was stronger than death shone in them, and gave them a strange beauty.

Cecil fell upon her knees beside his chair.

"Forgive me!" was all she could say—"forgive me!"

"For what, my own darling? For making me for one short moment the happiest man on earth?—for showing such kindness to my presumption? It was presumption, Cecil—I see it now—to chain your beauty to my ugliness. It was worse than the poor beast in the fairy tale."

"No, no!" she sobbed; "you were always too good, far too good to me."

There was a pause, and then he began again, only this time with a little effort.

"I sent for you, my own love, to ask you not to fret for me. I know your tender little heart, and that you will believe what my mother, in the first madness of her grief, will say; but it is not so. I never could have been a long-lived man, and after a little time, Cecil, my own, you will turn to that other. I hope he deserves you. I have taken care that in fortune you——"

"Oh, Tumley! dear Tumley! most generous, best of friends, what madness possessed me to throw away a true heart like yours! Live for me—give me but a little time that I may prove——" Her tears were falling like rain; her bright head was buried in the cushions; her whole frame shaking in an agony of grief.

Tumley laid his hand upon the soft, shining hair. Over his face came a great wave of joy.

"You would wish me to live?" he asked. "You would still? I had thought otherwise. I fancied——"

"They were fancies," Cecil answered, looking up quickly; "mere delusions. I am yours, and yours only; and as soon as you are well we will be married."

Tumley asked no more. He was too weak for much love-making, but he kissed the little hand that crept into his. From that time he rallied, and as happiness is better than the whole faculty put together, his recovery was rapid. Cecil was radiant. She developed an extraordinary faculty for nursing, and, like all true women, grew to care for her patient. By the time he was well she would let no one find fault with him but herself, and she thought him grown quite hand-some! They were married before the Autumn, as it was deemed desirable for Tumley to Winter abroad. The only sign Cecil gave of remembering her short flirtation was sending a newspaper with the full account of the wedding to Colonel William Montague.

Let us hope it spoiled his dinner!

SELECTING THE THANKSGIVING TURKEY.

OUR illustration on the front page tells its own story. The incident depicted is a familiar one in thousands of American households on the eve of Thanksgiving Day. The selection of the turkey for the Thanksgiving table, around which old and young gather with expectant appetites, partakes very often more of the character of a real competitive examination than many of the tests to which our boards of civil service reform subject their victims, and the decisions are certainly more frequently based on points of actual merit in the former than in the latter case.

BARON BOISSY D'ANGLAS,

FRENCH MINISTER TO MEXICO.

THE new Minister from France to Mexico, the Baron Boissy d'Anglas, who arrived last week in the Ferdinand de Lesseps, en route for the halls of the Montezumas, is thirty-four years of age, of medium height and of slight figure. He possesses a wonderfully vivacious smile and singularly graceful demeanor, while his voice is soft and low as that of a woman's. He is French to the tips of his fingers. His Excellency is a member of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Council-General of the Department of the Ardèche. He was elected Deputy on the 14th of October, 1877, by a majority of 3,000 votes over his opponent, who was sustained by the entire influence of the clerical party. He is no silent member, but from the outset has been recognized as a worker, and as such was placed on the Parliamentary Committee of the "16th of May." He voted with the party who advocated a commission of accusation against Marshal MacMahon, and it is scarcely necessary to say that he adheres to that advanced fraction of Republican union of which M. Gambetta is the most eminent impersonification. This young Deputy has the reputation of being one of the most ardent and most devoted Republicans in the Chamber, while at the same time he is a tried patriot, who has proved his patriotism by personal sacrifice. When the war of 1870 burst forth, Boissy d'Anglas, who was an officer in the territorial army, or militia, instantly resigned his commission, and joined a regiment of the line in order to serve his invaded country at the front. He took part in all the dangers, fatigues and deprivations of the Army of Paris, and never did a son of France serve her more daringly or more faithfully. As we have already stated, the young gentleman entertains for republicanism an enthusiastic and ardent affection, and it is owing to this sentiment that we find him in this country—a country for which he expresses so earnest an admiration. He has, however, come here in the most strict incognito, but we are informed that he proposes to return in a few months for the purpose of a closer study of our manners and customs and political institutions, all of which seem to possess the keenest interest for him. His Excellency owes the high mission with which he has been intrusted to his sterling qualities as a Deputy, an honor which he received by the suffrages of his co-citizens. French journals inform us that it is with a view to honoring the Government and people of Mexico, and to give to the relations of France with Mexico the most absolute entente cordiale, as well as the most marked, that President Grévy has selected a member of the Chamber of Deputies which represents, in the most unequivocal manner, not only the Government of the Republic of France, but likewise the French nation. This advantage will arise, that when M. le Baron Boisey d'Anglas returns to Paris he will be enabled, from a personal experience, to inform the Government and his parliamentary colleagues as to the enormous interests, politically, financially and commercially, which ought to draw those two great countries more and more together. His Excellency belongs to an old "Parliamentary" family of France. He is the grandson of the intrepid President of the National Convention, who, on the famous 1 Prairial Anno III., assumed the head of his colleagues, Féraud, which the murderers of that unfortunate personage presented to the President in derision on the top of a pike. We congratulate our sister Republic that such a distinguished gentleman as Le Baron Boisey d'Anglas should have been selected to wipe away the bitter memories of the past, and to smooth the path to the bright and lasting enfeux cordiale of the future.

THE NEW VANDERBILT ELEVATOR AT DETROIT.

THE growth of the grain traffic of Detroit has been so considerable during the last few years that additions to the elevator accommodations have been found from time to time absolutely necessary. One of the largest and most substantial structures of this description recently erected is elevator "A," built by Mr. Vanderbilt for the accommodation of the Michigan Central traffic. The foundation of this elevator was laid in May, 1879, but work upon the structure proper was not commenced until the following July, after which date it was rapidly pushed to completion. The building is constructed entirely of wood, resting on stone piers, and is covered with slate with the exception of the lower part, which is sheeted with iron. It is 190 feet long by 80 feet wide, with a capacity of over 700,000 bushels; it will hoist 30,000 pounds per hour and discharge 30,000. The grain is raised 120 feet to the top of the building, and there discharged into bins, which are 80 feet deep. The hoisting machinery is in the top story. Our illustration shows elevator "A," and still further up the river the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad elevator.

COFFEE CULTURE IN COSTA RICA.

HAVING illustrated in a previous issue the most approved method of roasting coffee as employed in New York City, we this week introduce our readers to some busy scenes in the coffee district of Costa Rica, Central America. The coffee-producing belt of the world lies between the isothermal lines of latitude 25° north and 30° south. It is said that the coffee-drinkers of Europe are indebted to Meinheer Van Hoorn, Governor of Batavia, as long ago as 1698, for this most delicious and exhilarating beverage. He is popularly credited with having sent a single seed or bean from Mocha, in Arabia, to the botanical garden in Amsterdam, and the progeny of this tree was forwarded to the West Indies in 1718, thus giving a start to the immense plantations existing there to-day.

The principal coffee-growing countries are Ceylon, Brazil, Central America, Cuba, Hayti, Java, British and French West Indies, Guiana, Porto Rico, Sumatra, Venezuela, Peru, Arabia and Abyssinia. The berries when ground are adulterated to an enormous extent. Chemists have detected mixed with it in various ways the following substances: Acorns, almonds, beans, beech-nuts, beetroot, chickory, peas, currant seeds, gooseberry seeds, lupins, sassafras, water-flag seeds and many other foreign seeds, roots and berries.

A coffee plantation forms a most interesting study. The trees attain an average height of twelve feet, although running at times to thirty. They are well shaped and bushy, covered with a grayish bark, and the branches are incased in clusters of fragrant white flowers at the roots of the leaves. The fruit itself looks somewhat like a small cherry or cranberry, and its ripeness is indicated by a deep red color. Either when in full bloom or when covered with ripe fruit these trees, with their long, shining, dark-green leaves, present a very beautiful appearance. They continue to put forth, while the fruit of former blossoms is coming to maturity, and the ripe coffee may, therefore, be gathered at almost every season. As the coffee-trees are raised from the seed in nurseries, and set out in rows when a year old, they do not bear under three years, and can scarcely be said to be profitable under five. In Central America they bear well for twelve or fifteen years, while in Africa, Brazil and Ceylon they will frequently yield good crops up to twenty or twenty-five. In the West Indies and Central America the berries are picked by hand, as shown in one of our illustrations, but in the Arabian plantations, owing to the non-prevalence of rains that would strip them from the branches, they are allowed to remain until fully ripe, and then removed by gently shaking the trees, when the berries fall upon cloths spread beneath the branches.

When first picked the berries are dried in the shade, and then put through a machine which removes the pulp, or, where machinery is not used, this labor is done by hand. Still covered with a glutinous substance, the fruit is spread out in the full glare of the sun, being occasionally tossed about and turned over with wooden shovels and curious rakes. When all the moisture has disappeared the beans are gathered and the husk removed. This process is carried out on some plantations by passing the fruit between wooden rollers; on others by gently pounding it in a wooden mortar; and again by being made to revolve in a circular trough shod with steel. The husk once broken, without cracking the fruit, the chaff is separated by a fanning mill. After this, it is the custom of some very careful planters to have the fruit spread out on long tables and picked over by women and children, all the bad beans being removed. It only remains then to have the beans put into bags, weighed, marked and carted away for shipment.

The relative status of the chief coffee consuming countries ranges as follows: First the United States, consuming 322,000,000 pounds; next Germany, which takes 218,000,000; next France, with 110,000,000; next Austria-Hungary, with 82,000,000; then Holland, with 68,800,000; and finally Belgium, with 48,000,000 pounds. These countries take eighty per cent. of the whole product of the world. England ranks among the third-rate consumers, and Russia, with her eighty millions of people, consumes only one fifth of a pound per capita.

CRANBERRIES FOR THANKSGIVING.

OF all fruit-raising, cranberry culture is the most uncertain, not more than one season in five or six escaping the early frost, against which there is no protection, and of whose approach there is no warning, while the vines are always subject to the attacks of the cranberry-worm, which sometimes destroys the entire crop. The yield of 1871 was the largest ever known, and was successfully harvested, but it has been followed either by total failures or only partial crops. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been invested in the business, which is attended with the greatest risk, but offers the possibility of a large fortune.

In almost all of the Northern States there are localities suitable for this industry, the requisites being a soil of muck or peat that can be drained for twelve or eighteen inches below the surface, a supply of water sufficient to allow the meadow to be flooded at will, and an abundance of pure sand. The vines are set out regularly in the form of cuttings, in rows like corn, leaving ample space both for the vines to spread and for the pickers to work without crushing the branches.

Cranberries were, it is believed, first cultivated in Massachusetts at Cape Cod, and while there are large meadows devoted to them in the various States, the counties of Ocean, Cape May, Atlantic and Burlington, in New Jersey, yield more than one-half of all that reach the markets. Many patches of hitherto waste swamp land have been converted into very valuable cranberry bogs or meadows at a slight outlay and with comparatively little labor. The greater part of the crop sold to the Western markets is raised at Berlin, Wis., where there is an immense marsh that has been prepared in the most scientific manner for this special product. The pickers are chosen mainly from the Scandinavians and Germans who have located in the vicinity in large numbers.

Wherever cranberry culture is carried on, when the picking begins, in October, the whole country round turns out en masse, for berry time is a succession of gala days, men, women, and children of all ages pouring towards the marshes in what seems an endless stream of humanity. Each picker is supplied with a pan or low basket which when filled is emptied into a box of one bushel capacity. A ticket is given the picker for every bushel delivered, and on presenting these tickets to the superintendent at pay time the wages are computed and paid on them. The usual price paid is 75 cents a bushel, and the average day's work is not more than two or three bushels, although it is not uncommon to pick five bushels, and a few experts have been known to pick seven bushels in a single day. The picking being often hurried on account of threatened approach of frost, a second picking is sometimes necessary, for which about a dollar a bushel is paid.

Here and there among the pickers whose object is to gain a living, will be found bevies of girls and young women who leave homes of comfort and plenty to "rough it" on the bogs for the brief season. The greatest hilarity prevails during picking time, the nights being given up to innocent revelry and mirth on the part of the young men and maidens after the manner of the corn-husking and apple-paring seasons.

The entire surface of cranberry meadows is flooded during Winter, the water being let in as soon as the crop is gathered, and drawn off by June at the latest, according to the severity of the weather at the locality.

What Freight-cars Carry.

IT is but a few years since ten tons, or 20,000 pounds, were considered the maximum load for a freight-car, but the figures of the Western Weighing Association show a remarkable increase in this respect. During six weeks nearly 50,000 cars were weighed, and while the average of the different classes of freight ran from 23,150 (for machinery) to 29,925 (for ore), the maximum in nearly all cases exceeded 30,000, and for some classes of freight reached, respectively, as high as 35,000, 37,750, 39,800, 32,600 and even, in the case of ore, to the enormous weight of 48,500 pounds, or more than 24 tons. The superintendent of the association is satisfied that the various articles of freight enumerated —twenty-three in number—will average fully 27,000 pounds per car, and the whole will not average less than 25,000 pounds per car. The fact that such loads can be safely carried now is due partly to the vastly improved condition of the tracks as well as to the heavier construction of the car.

Commercial Importance of Louisiana Oranges.

"THERE are not many," says the New Orleans Democrat, "who appreciate the extent of our orange trade, or who realize what an enormous source of revenue the culture of this fruit may be made. On the 26th of October there were shipped from here, on the Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad, eleven car-loads of oranges destined to Denver, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Chicago, and Evansville. There were in this shipment 1,320 barrels, and averaging the barrel at 300, we have a total of 396,000 oranges sent in one day by one railway to supply the increasing demand in the West for the fruit, which is far superior to the oranges of Cuba, and even the much-vaunted fruit of Florida. Between the 1st of October and the 26th there were shipped by the same road to the Western cities, 21,000 barrels, an aggregate of 6,300,000 oranges."

Disraeli's New Novel.

LORD BEACONSFIELD'S new novel, "Endymion," just published, is attracting attention in literary circles. It has been generally reported and believed that Mr. Gladstone was to figure largely in its pages, and possibly to be mentioned in as uncomplimentary fashion as Professor Goldwin Smith was in "Lothair"; but it is now authoritatively stated that this is not the case. There will, however, be several pungent sketches of well-known men and women of the day. The Longmans have paid the immense sum of £30,000 for the manuscript. No such price was ever heard of before for a novel, and Lord Beaconsfield is so much pleased with this liberal treatment that he has promised the same enterprising firm a novel to succeed "Endymion," for which he has been offered similar terms. The interest of the literary and of the social world is concentrated on this new book, and the first edition will be of not less than 20,000 copies.

The Population of New York.

THE population of the territory now included in the City of New York is, according to the census returns just published, 1,206,577; of the total, 590,762 are males, and 615,815 females. This is an increase of 264,295 within ten years, comparison being made with the population of New York as given in the census of 1870. Of the present population, the annexed Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards contain 41,656. Deducting this number from the total for the city, we find that New York, as bounded in 1870, has increased in population 222,639, or 21.6 per cent. Of this increase 173,977 is in the native and 46,962 in the foreign-born population, the former being 33.5 per cent. of the same class in 1870, and the latter 11.2 per cent., showing the rate of increase in the former to be almost exactly three times as rapid as in the latter.

The New Hebrides.

THE New Hebrides, where the British have lately established a coaling station, with the ultimate intent, as the French newspapers not unreasonably suspect, of annexing the islands, are in the Pacific Ocean, to the northeast of New Caledonia, and to the west of the Fijis, and are considered the most westerly part of Polynesia. The islands comprise Espiritu Santo, 65 miles long by 20 broad; Malli-collo, 60 by 28 miles; Ambrym, Amaatom, Erromango, Tanna, having an active volcano, and Aurora, all much smaller. Most of the group are well-wooded and hilly, some even mountainous. The most valuable woods are sandal and ebony; the chief vegetable products, yams, sweet potatoes, cucumbers, bananas, cocoanuts, and the sole animal of consequence a small hog, which is no bigger at maturity than a rabbit. The area of the group is estimated at 25,000 square miles, and the population at 220,000. The inhabitants, fierce, but indolent and filthy, are of the Papuan race. They, like other Papuans, are generally well-formed, have regular features, intelligent black eyes, small white teeth, curly hair, thick lips and large mouths. Their noses are sharp though flat beneath, nostrils wide, and their skin dark-brown. They are often taller than Europeans, but their legs are long and thin, and they have the splay foot of the negro. The men build the huts, hollow trunks of trees into canoes, hunt and fish; while the women till the fields, make mats, cut wood, and do the heaviest work. Their food is fish, fruits, birds, and the flesh of the wild hogs. Their weapons are mainly clubs, and bows and arrows. The hair of the men is generally frizzled out into a large mop; but the hair of the women is always cut short. The natives of the New Hebrides have often been called cannibals; but it is very questionable if they are such. They differ in many respects from the Papuans of New Guinea, and seem, on the whole, to be rather inferior to them. Nevertheless, they are declared by all ethnologists to be of the same race, and in no direct manner related to the Malays, Polynesians, or Australians, who, with the Papuans, compose the four types of the human family occupying what is known as the Oceanic region. If the English should annex the New Hebrides, the aborigines would very soon disappear.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Jubilee of the Comedie Francaise.

The jubilee performances at the Comédie Française in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the establishment proved an extraordinary success. On the 24th of October Molière's one-act fantastic trifle called "L'Impromptu de Versailles" was given, wherein the actor-poet has represented himself, surrounded by his troupe, rehearsing a new piece. The "Impromptu" has never been acted since Molière's death but twice, on which occasions the celebrated Hamons assumed the part of the dramatist. The character is now sustained by M. Coquelin, while all the ladies of the troupe took part in the piece. The jubilee was brought to a close by a gala performance of the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

Columns of Porphyry at Brussels.

Among the many artistic attractions of the national Belgian jubilee at Brussels, the two columns of porphyry erected on the plaza of the exposition grounds are notable for their size and their great beauty. The principal uses of porphyry are in architecture and ornamental articles, and in slabs and mullers for grinding hard powdered substances to extreme fineness. No material is more durable, and none retains better the sharp lines and high polish which it receives. The columns in the exposition grounds were exhibited by a company now working the ancient quarries of Quenast, employing 2,000 artisans.

Excommunication of a French Prefect.

Much amusement has been created recently not only in Paris, but throughout France, by the formal excommunication of a Prefect by a Bishop for carrying out the new laws relating to religious corporations. On sending in his card the Bishop was met by the Prefect at the door and escorted to the business office. With a brief explanation and several expressions of sorrow at the painful duty, the Bishop proceeded seriatim in his work of excommunication, even cutting off the Prefect from the privileges of Mass and burial in consecrated ground. The Prefect listened to all with much coolness, stated the law under which he was acting, and seeing that the Bishop had finished his mission, arose and, with all the gallantry of a Frenchman, escorted his visitor to the door and ceremoniously bade him good-day.

A Scene in a Montenegrin Camp.

Our illustration represents a scene in the Montenegrin camp near Antivari. Meal time is at hand, and the soldier's appetite needs but little whet. Montenegrins are remarkable for the vastness of their appetites and for their extraordinary love for goat's flesh—a favorite dish being breast of kid stuffed with sweet herbs. On the present occasion, however, their fare is likely to be less delicate, and if they can obtain a piece of goat to broil on the fire for which the women are preparing wood, together with some black bread and that thin wine known as "votash," they may esteem themselves something more than fortunate. However, the Montenegrin can rough it as well as most folks, and suit the condition of his stomach to the condition of his surroundings.

The Works at the Port of Dunkerque.

The nearest French port to London is that of Dunkerque, and all ships unable to make Calais run for the former. The inhabitants of Dunkerque have been sturdy sailors from time immemorial, and have furnished many a brave and distinguished captain to the once dashing navy of France. On the 31st of October the new docks at Dunkerque were solemnly and officially inaugurated by the Minister for Public Works, the Minister of Marine, and other notable personages. Great expectations are formed of the capacities of these docks for the output of the mines of Valenciennes; and since within an extraordinarily brief period of time Dunkerque has leaped into the fourth place as a seaport of France, her new docks are relied upon as further and potent levers to her prosperity.

The Completion of Cologne Cathedral.

The completion of Cologne Cathedral was celebrated on Friday and Saturday, August 13th, 14th last, with the most brilliant ceremonies. Cologne itself was most beautifully bedecked in festive attire, and filled with the most princely and distinguished personages of Germany. On Monday morning the Emperor, the Empress and the King of Saxony, with many other reigning Princes, went to the Cathedral, where they were greeted by the Dean and the Architectural Commission, and a grand Te Deum was sung, after which came the ceremony of the day. The Imperial party, coming out of the Cathedral, crossed the square, which had been surrounded with galleries for privileged spectators, and took up their places in a pavilion. Here the deed referring to the completion of the Cathedral was read to the Emperor, and was subsequently signed by the whole party. It was then taken up to the summit of one of the towers, where it is to be beneath the topmost ornament. The Emperor then delivered an address, congratulating the nation on the completion of the Cathedral, and referring affectionately to his brother, King Frederick William IV., under whose auspices the work had been recommenced thirty-eight years ago. To this the chief architect and the President of the Building Commission made suitable replies, and the Imperial standard being hoisted on the tower, the huge Emperor Bell rang out, a salvo of artillery was fired, the document was shipped into its receptacle, and the final inauguration of Cologne Cathedral was achieved.

Salmon-spearing on the Dee.

The Cluny and the Dee, in Scotland, afford rare entertainment to the devotees of fishing. During the recent visit of the Prince of Wales to the Highlands several parties were made up for a day's sport in these vicinities, salmon and trout being the attractions. Salmon, when frightened, put their heads under a stone if one is within sight, and are thus easily speared. Sometimes a net is stretched across the stream, and the spearers, who are the Queen's gamekeepers and their friends, drive the fish up to it, when they are taken without trouble.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—SCARCITY of food has led 3,000 persons to leave Bologna.

—THE mackerel fishery of the American fleet in the Bay of St. Lawrence has this year been a failure, many of the fleet having left the grounds without taking a fish.

—THE total values of the exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during the month of October, 1880, were $25,711,468, and during October, 1879, $23,048,607.

—THE total amount of fees received last year for official service rendered at the various United States Consulates aggregated $836,548. The salaries and emoluments to consular officers amounted to $574,773.

—DURING the last fifty years 2,400 persons have been sentenced to death in France, and of this number 1,461 have been executed, while 939 have either been pardoned or have obtained a commutation of their sentence.

—THE second enumeration of the population of St. Louis, which was ordered because of the intense local dissatisfaction with the results of the first, shows a variation of only 5,000 in the figures. It leaves the city with only 338,000 inhabitants, instead of the half million they had hoped for.

—A SCHEME for changing the channel of the St. Lawrence at Montreal, by building an immense dike, at a cost of $7,000,000, is under consideration. The advantages would be a still-water harbor, water power for mills, and the protection of the lower part of the city against annual freshets.

—SALMON fishing on the Columbia River, Oregon, is very dangerous, owing to certain tidal peculiarities. Two hundred men at least are reported as lost during the past season. Over eight hundred boats are employed by the canning companies, and over four thousand men at the canneries.

—THE Municipal Council and Chamber of Commerce of Havre, France, are moving for the creation of a new department to be called that of the Seine Maritime, of which Havre shall be the capital. Havre has grown from 25,000 people in 1850 to 90,000 to-day. In 1879 nearly 12,000 vessels entered and left that port.

—JESUITS having attempted to re-enter Portugal, the Government has instructed the various Governors strictly to enforce the decree of 1834 abolishing all religious Orders. The arrival of French monks at Alicante and Barcelona, in Spain, caused hostile popular demonstrations. They were compelled to re-embark from the latter place.

—OGDEN, Utah, is the first city west of the Mississippi River, to adopt the electric light. A flagstaff, sixty feet high, is to be run up the Court House dome, giving an elevation of 200 feet, from which four lights, of 2,000-candle power each, are guaranteed to abundantly illuminate a space one mile in diameter. The lights are to be in operation before the 1st of February.

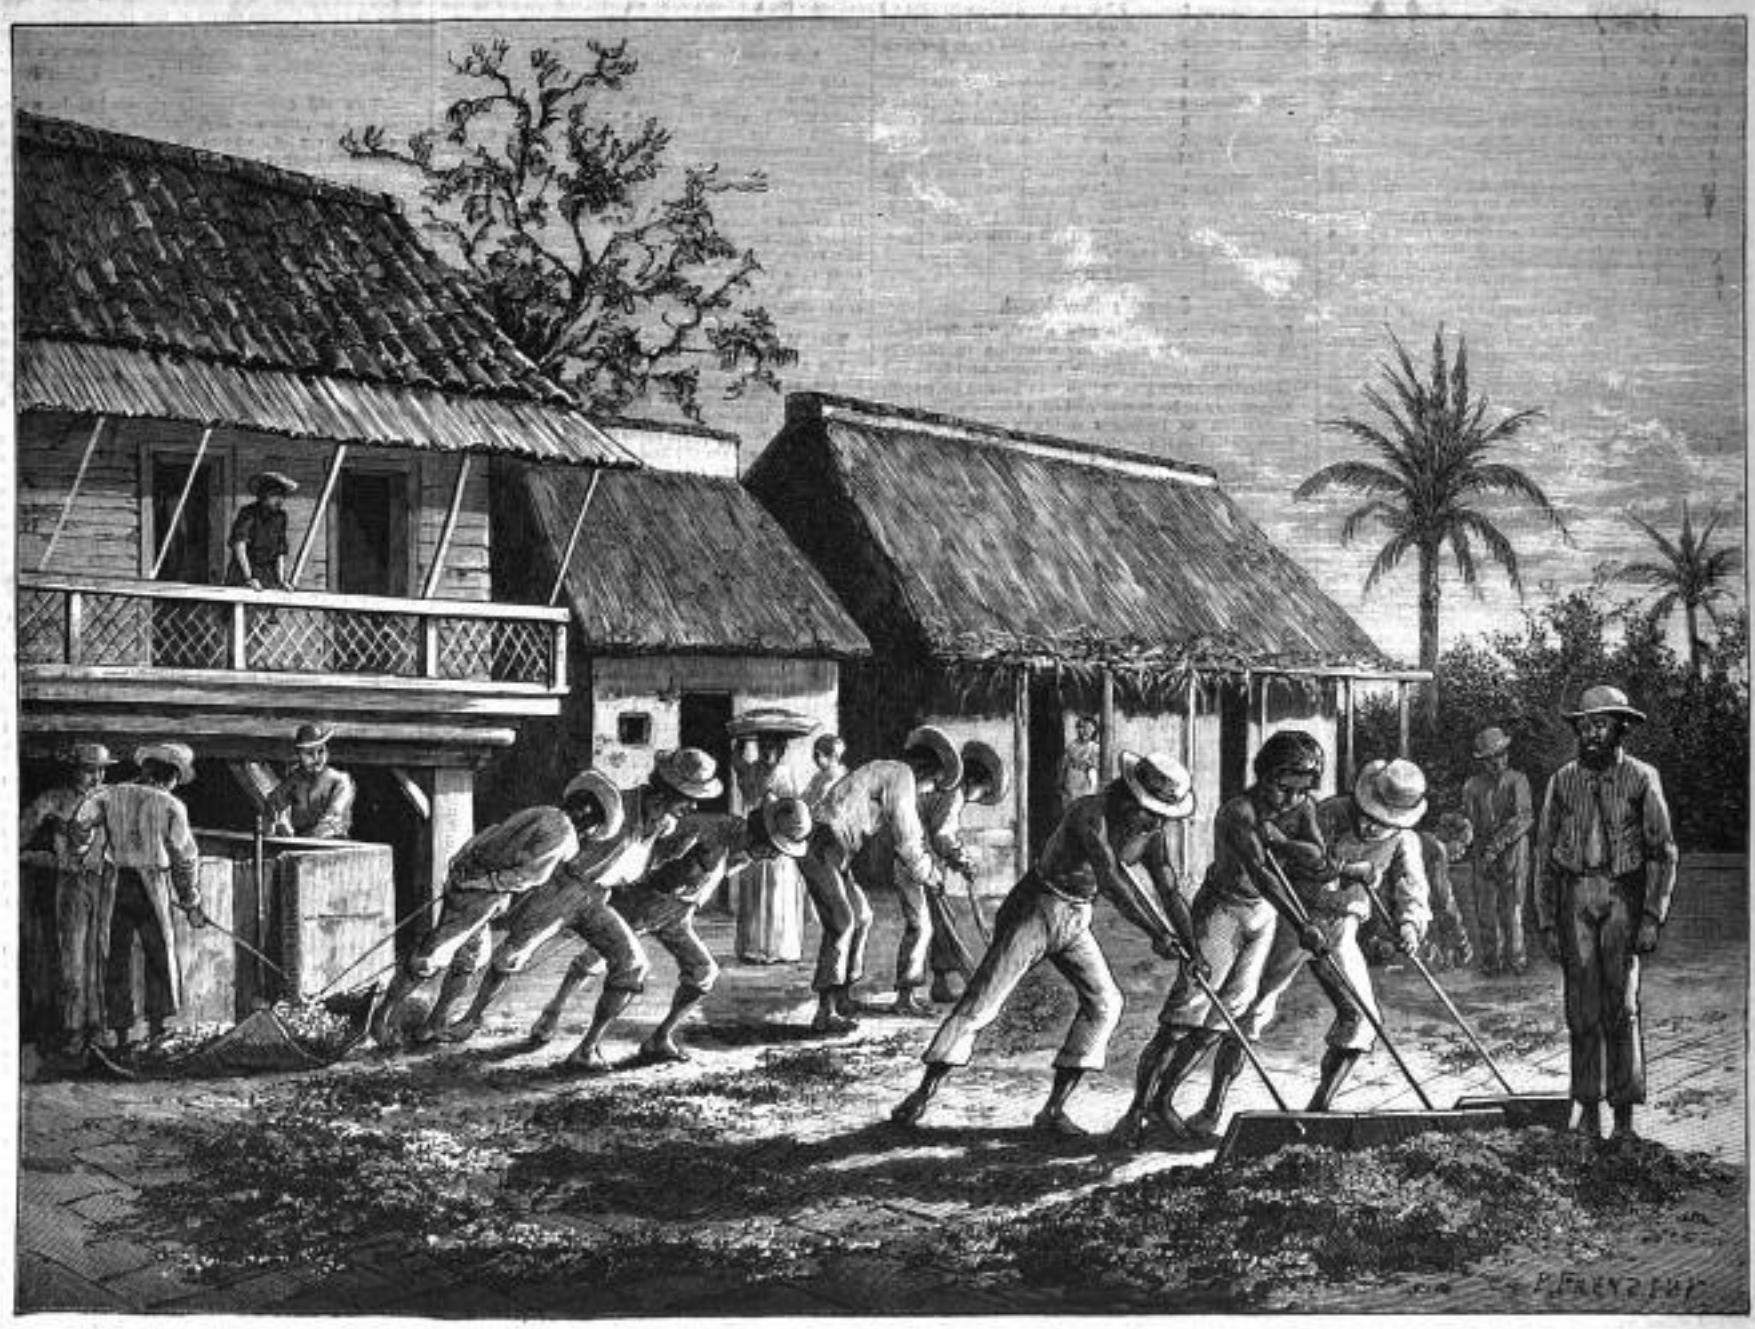
—SAGACIOUS French politicians predict that a closely-contested and hard-fought political battle will result from the present complications in Governmental affairs. A policy of isolation has been inaugurated throughout the country towards those who participated in the execution of the decrees for the expulsion of the Jesuits. They are severely debarred from society and denied social recognition.

—A ST. PETERSBURG dispatch says that immediately after the recent execution of the Nihilists, six suspected women found in the crowd were taken into custody. Upon searching them there were found, concealed in their clothing charts of the principal Russian prisons, and a chart and full description of the Czar's new yacht Livadia. The prison plans were drawn by a German artist, and the sketches of the yacht by an Englishman.

—THE old apprenticeship system has been revived by a manufacturer at Springfield, Mass. The boys bind themselves for six years and are to receive from five cents an hour at the beginning to twelve at the end. In addition, two cents an hour will be placed to their credit, and paid on their discharge, thus providing for each about $600 for a start on his own account. The employer stipulates for fifty-eight hours of work a week, and nine of study.

—AT Portadown, in the County of Armagh, Ireland, the opponents of the Land League are fighting it with its own weapons. The Orangemen of the town have posted notices in every conspicuous place calling on all Protestants to cease every kind of communication not only with the members of the Land League but even with the Home Rulers. The notices call on them to sell nothing to, nor buy anything from, nor even to work for, the parties they so bitterly proscribe.

—ARRANGEMENTS have been concluded to take the census of all the organizations which include as a part of their faith and practice the principle of non-combativeness and non-litigation. This will include a count of the Quakers, Dunkards, Mennonites and the many minor organizations in the country holding to peace views. The supervision of the work will be in the hands of Dr. Henry Randall Waite, of New York, and the practical part of the work will be done by Howard Miller, of Lewisburg, Pa.



—GENERAL SHERMAN, in his annual report, recommends that the Army be increased to 30,000 men. He refers to the condition of the armament defenses as inadequate, and says that all distinctions as to colored regiments should be abolished. Referring to the extension of the Pacific Railroad system he says: "These railroads are penetrating every valley and every district of country which holds out an inducement to settlement. The railroads have completely revolutionized our country in the past few years, and impose on the military an entire change of policy. Hitherto we have been compelled to maintain small posts along wagon and stage routes of travel. These are no longer needed, because no longer used, and the settlements which grow up speedily along the new railroads afford the security necessary, and the regular stations, built for storage at convenient distances, afford the necessary shelter for stores and for the men when operating in the neighborhood."

—THE earnings of the main stem and branches of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad for 1880, in comparison with the fiscal year of 1879, have increased $2,265,063.77, and the working expenses $1,533,318.10, making a comparative increase in the net profits of $831,736.67. The profit and loss account shows an increase for the past year of $2,356,984.44. The surplus fund, which represents invested capital derived from net earnings, and which is not represented by either stock or bonds, now amounts to $40,561,642.37. It is shown by the report of the transportation department that the tonnage of through merchandise East and West has been 1,980,337 tons, while in the preceding year it was about 1,425,629 tons; 598,992 barrels of flour, and 25,982,696 bushels of grain were brought to Baltimore during the fiscal year. Of this aggregate of grain, 16,409,309 bushels were of wheat and 3,510,456 bushels of corn. In live stock the traffic has been 165,454 tons, and in lumber 54,520 tons. The passenger earnings exhibit an increase from $1,171,033.20 in the preceding year to $1,378,590.34. The coal trade of the main stem shows an aggregate of 2,255,146 tons, which includes 423,254 tons of the company's supply, being an increase of 659,142 tons over the preceding year.

CHAPTER X.—FATHER BENWELL'S CORRESPONDENCE.

I.

"TO MR. BITRAKE—Private and confidential—Sir: I understand that your connection with the law does not exclude your occasional superintendence of confidential inquiries which are not of a nature to injure your professional position. The inclosed letter of introduction will satisfy you that I am incapable of employing your experience in a manner unbecoming to you or to myself.

"The inquiry that I propose to you relates to a gentleman named Winterfield. He is now staying in London, at Derwent's Hotel, and is expected to remain there for a week from the present date. His place of residence is on the North Devonshire coast, and is well known in that locality by the name of Beaupark House.

"The range of my proposed inquiry dates back over the last four or five years—certainly not more. My object is to ascertain, as positively as may be, whether, within this limit of time, events in Mr. Winterfield's life have connected him with a young lady named Miss Stella Eyrecourt. If this proves to be the case, it is essential that I should be made acquainted with the whole of the circumstances.

"I have now informed you of all that I want to know. Whatever the information may be, it is most important that it shall be information which I can implicitly trust. Please address to me, when you write, under cover to the friend whose letter I inclose.

"I beg your acceptance—as time is of importance—of a check for preliminary expenses, and remain, sir, your faithful servant,

"AMBROSE BENWELL."

II.

"To the Secretary, Society of Jesus, Rome.

"I inclose a receipt for the remittance which your last letter confides to my care. Some of the money has been already used in prosecuting inquiries, the result of which will, as I hope and believe, enable me to effectually protect Romayne from the advances of the woman who is bent on marrying him.

"You tell me that our Reverend Fathers, lately sitting in council on the Vange Abbey affair, are anxious to hear if any positive steps have yet been taken toward the conversion of Romayne. I am happily able to gratify their wishes, as you shall now see.

"Yesterday I called at Romayne's hotel to pay one of those occasional visits which help to keep up our acquaintance. He was out, and Penrose (for whom I asked next) was with him. Most fortunately, as the event proved, I had not seen Penrose, or heard from him, for some little time, and I thought it desirable to judge for myself of the progress that he was making in the confidence of his employer. I said I would wait. The hotel servant knows me by sight. I was shown into the waiting-room.

"This room is so small as to be a mere cupboard. It is lit by a glass fanlight over the door which opens from the passage, and is supplied with air (in the absence of a fireplace) by a ventilator in a second door, which communicates with Romayne's study. Looking about me, so far, I crossed to the other end of the study and discovered a dining-room and two bedrooms beyond—the set of apartments being secluded, by means of a door at the end of the passage, from the other parts of the hotel. I trouble you with these details in order that you may understand the events that followed.

"I returned to the waiting room, not forgetting, of course, to close the door of communication.

"Nearly an hour must have passed before I heard footsteps in the passage. The study door was opened, and the voices of the persons entering the room reached me through the ventilator. I recognized Romayne, Penrose—and Lord Loring.

"The first words exchanged among them informed me that Romayne and his secretary had overtaken Lord Loring in the street as he was approaching the hotel-door. The three had entered the house together—at a time, probably, when the servant who had admitted me was out of the way. However it may have happened, there I was, forgotten in the waiting room!

"Could I intrude myself (on a private conversation, perhaps)—as an unannounced and unwelcome visitor? And could I help it, if the talk found its way to me through the ventilator, along with the air that I breathed? If our Reverend Fathers think I was to blame, I bow to any reproof which their strict sense of propriety may inflict on me. In the meantime I beg to repeat the interesting passages in the conversation, as nearly word for word as I can remember them.

"His lordship, as the principal personage in social rank, shall be reported first. He said, 'More than a week has passed. Romayne, and we have neither seen you nor heard from you. Why have you neglected us?'

"Here, judging by certain sounds that followed, Penrose got up discreetly, and left the room. Lord Loring went on.

"He said to Romayne: 'Now we are alone, I may speak to you more freely. You and Stella seemed to get on together admirably that evening when you dined with us. Have you forgotten what you told me of her influence over you, or have you altered your opinion—and is that the reason why you keep away from us?'

"Romayne answered, 'My opinion remains unchanged. All that I said to you of Miss Eyrecourt, I believe as firmly as ever.'

"His lordship remonstrated, naturally enough. 'Then why remain away from the good influence? Why—if it really can be controlled—risk another return of that dreadful nervous delusion?'

"'I have had another return.'

"'Which, as you yourself believe, might have been prevented! Romayne, you astonish me.'

"There was a time of silence before Romayne answered this. He was a little mysterious when he did reply. 'You know the old saying, my good friend—of two evils, choose the least. I bear my sufferings as one of two evils, and the least of the two.'

"Lord Loring appeared to feel the necessity of touching a delicate subject with a light hand. He said, in his pleasant way, 'Stella isn't the other evil, I suppose?'

"'Most assuredly not!'

"'Then what is it?'

"Romayne answered, almost passionately, 'My own weakness and selfishness! Faults which I must resist, or become a mean and heartless man. For me the worst of the two evils is there. I respect and admire Miss Eyrecourt—I believe her to be a woman in a thousand—don't ask me to see her again! Where is Penrose? Let us talk of something else.'

"Whether this wild way of speaking offended Lord Loring, or only discouraged him, I cannot say. I heard him take his leave in these words: 'You have disappointed me, Romayne. We will talk of something else the next time we meet.' The study door was opened and closed. Romayne was left by himself.

"Solitude was apparently not to his taste, just then. I heard him call to Penrose. I heard Penrose ask, 'Do you want me?'

"Romayne answered, 'God knows I want a friend—and I have no friend near me but you! Major Hynd is away, and Lord Loring is offended with me.'

"Penrose asked why.

"Romayne, thereupon, entered on the necessary explanation. As a priest writing to priests, I pass over details utterly uninteresting to us. The substance of what he said amounted to this: Miss Eyrecourt had produced an impression on him which was new to him in his experience of women. If he saw more of her, it might end—I ask your pardon for repeating the ridiculous expression—in his 'falling in love with her.' In this condition of mind or body, whichever it may be, he would probably be incapable of the self-control which he had hitherto practiced. If she consented to devote her life to him, he might accept the cruel sacrifice. Rather than do this, he would keep away from her for her dear sake—no matter what he might suffer or whom he might offend.

"Imagine any human being, out of a lunatic asylum, talking in this way. Shall I own to you, my reverend colleague, how this curious self exposure struck me? As I listened to Romayne, I felt grateful to the famous council, which definitely forbade the priests of the Catholic Church to marry. We might otherwise have been morally enervated by the weakness which degrades Romayne—and priests might have become instruments in the hands of women.

"But you will be anxious to hear what Penrose did under the circumstances. For the moment, I can tell you this, he startled me.

"Instead of seizing the opportunity, and directing Romayne's mind to the consolations of religion, Penrose actually encouraged him to reconsider his decision. All the weakness of my poor little Arthur's character showed itself in his next words.

"He said to Romayne, 'It may be wrong in me to speak to you as freely as I wish to speak. But you have so generously admitted me to your confidence—you have been so considerate and so kind towards me—that I feel an interest in your happiness, which perhaps makes me over bold. Are you very sure that some such entire change in your life as your marriage might not end in delivering you from your burden? If such a thing could be, is it wrong to suppose that your wife's good influence over you might be the means of making your marriage a happy one? I must not presume to offer an opinion on such a subject. It is only my gratitude, my true attachment to you, that ventures to put the question. Are you conscious of having given this matter—so serious a matter for you—sufficient thought?'

"Make your mind easy, reverend sir! Romayne's answer set everything right.

"He said, 'I have thought of it till I could think no longer. I still believe that sweet woman might control the torment of the voice. But could she deliver me from the remorse perpetually gnawing at my heart? I feel as murderers feel. In taking another man's life—a man who has not even injured me!—I have committed the one unatonable and unpardonable sin. Can any human creature's influence make me forget that? No more of it—no more. Come! Let us take refuge in our books.'

"Those words touched Penrose in the right place. Now, as I understand his scruples, he felt that he might honorably speak out. His zeal more than balanced his weakness, as you will presently see.

"He was loud, he was positive, when I heard him next. 'No!' he burst out, 'your refuge is not in books, and not in the barren religious forms which call themselves Protestant. Dear master, the peace of mind which you believe you have lost for ever, you will find again in the divine wisdom and compassion of the Holy Catholic Church. There is the new life that will yet make you a happy man!'

"I repeat what he said, so far, merely to satisfy you that we can trust his enthusiasm when it is once roused. Nothing will discourage, nothing will defeat him now. He spoke with all the eloquence of conviction—using the necessary arguments with a force and feeling which I have rarely heard equaled. Romayne's silence vouched for the effect on him. He is not the man to listen patiently to reasoning which he thinks he can overthrow.

"Having heard enough to satisfy me that Penrose had really begun the good word, I quietly slipped out of the waiting room, and left the hotel.

"To day being Sunday, I shall not lose a post if I keep my letter open until to-morrow. I have already sent a note to Penrose, asking him to call on me, at his earliest convenience. There may be more news for you before post time.

"Monday, 10 A.M.

"There is more news. Penrose has just left me.

"His first proceeding, of course, was to tell me what I had already discovered for myself. He is modest, as usual, about the prospect of success which awaits him. But he has induced Romayne to suspend his historical studies for a few days, and to devote his attention to the books which we are accustomed to recommend for perusal in such cases as his. This is unquestionably a great gain at starting.

"But my news is not at an end yet. Romayne is actually playing our game—he has resolved definitely to withdraw himself from the influence of Miss Eyrecourt! In another hour he and Penrose will have left London. Their destination is kept a profound secret. All letters addressed to Romayne are to be sent to his bankers.

"The motive for this sudden resolution is directly traceable to Lady Loring.

"Her ladyship called at the hotel yesterday evening and had a private interview with Romayne. Her object, no doubt, was to shake his resolution, and to make him submit himself again to Miss Eyrecourt's fascinations. What means of persuasion she used to effect this purpose is of course unknown to us. Penrose saw Romayne after her ladyship's departure, and describes him as violently agitated. I can quite understand it. His resolution to take refuge in secret flight (it is really nothing less) speaks for itself as to the impression produced on him, and the danger from which, for the time at least, we have escaped.

"Yes! I say 'for the time at least.' Don't let our reverend fathers suppose that the money expended on my private inquiries has been money thrown away. Where these miserable love affairs are concerned, women are daunted by no adverse circumstances and warned by no defeat. Romayne has left London in dread of his own weakness—we must not forget that. The day may yet come when nothing will interpose between us and failure but my knowledge of events in Miss Eyrecourt's life.

"For the present, there is no more to be said."

CHAPTER XI.—STELLA ASSERTS HERSELF.

TWO days after Father Benwell had posted his letter to Rome, Lady Loring entered her husband's study and asked eagerly if he had heard any news of Romayne.

Lord Loring shook his head.

"As I told you yesterday," he said, "the proprietor of the hotel can give me no information. I went myself this morning to the bankers, and saw the head partner. He offered to forward letters, but he could do no more. Until further notice, he was positively enjoined not to disclose Romayne's address to anybody. How does Stella bear it?"

"In the worst possible way," Lady Loring answered. "In silence."

"Not a word even to you?"

"Not a word."

At that reply the servant interrupted them by announcing the arrival of a visitor, and presenting his card. Lord Loring started and handed it to his wife. The card bore the name of "Major Hynd," and this line was added in pencil: "On business connected with Mr. Romayne."

"Show him in directly!" cried Lady Loring. Lord Loring remonstrated.

"My dear, perhaps I had better see this gentleman alone!"

"Certainly not—unless you wish to drive me into committing an act of the most revolting meanness! If you send me away, I shall listen at the door."

Major Hynd was shown in, and was duly presented to Lady Loring. After making the customary apologies, he said:

"I returned to London last night expressly to see Romayne on a matter of importance. Failing to discover his present address at the hotel, I had the hope that your lordship might be able to direct me to our friend."

"I am sorry to say I know no more than you do," Lord Loring replied. "Romayne's present address is a secret confided to his bankers and to no one else. I will give you their names, if you wish to write to him."

Major Hynd hesitated. "I am not quite sure that it would be discreet to write to him under the circumstances."

Lady Loring could no longer keep silence. "Is it possible, Major Hynd, to tell us what the circumstances are?" she asked. "I am almost as old a friend of Romayne as my husband—and I am very anxious about him."

The major looked embarrassed. "I can scarcely answer your ladyship," he said, "without reviving painful recollections——"

Lady Loring's impatience interrupted the major's apologies. "Do you mean the duel?" she inquired.

Lord Loring interposed. "I should tell you, Major Hynd, that Lady Loring is as well informed as I am of what happened at Boulogne, and of the deplorable result, so far as Romayne is concerned. If you still wish to speak to me privately, I will ask you to accompany me into the next room."

Major Hynd's embarrassment vanished. "After what you tell me," he said, "I hope to be favored with Lady Loring's advice. You both know that Romayne fought the fatal duel with the son of the French General who had challenged him. When we returned to England, we heard that the General and his family had been driven away from Boulogne by pecuniary difficulties. Romayne, against my advice, wrote to the surgeon who had been present at the duel, desiring that the General's place of retreat might be discovered, and expressing his wish to assist the family anonymously, as their Unknown Friend. The motive, of course, was, in his own words, 'to make some little atonement to the poor people whom he had wronged.' I thought it a rash proceeding at the time, and I am confirmed in my opinion by a letter from the surgeon, received yesterday. Will you kindly read it to Lady Loring?"

He handed the letter to Lord Loring. Translated from the French, it ran as follows:

"SIR—I am at last able to answer Mr. Romayne's letter definitely, with the courteous assistance of the French Consul in London, to whom I applied, when other means of investigation had produced no result.

"A week since the General died. Circumstances connected with the burial expenses informed the Consul that he had taken refuge from his creditors, not in France as we supposed, but in London. The address is No. 10 Camp's Hill, Islington. I should also add that the General, for obvious reasons, lived in London under the assumed name of Marillac. It will be necessary, therefore, to inquire for his widow by the name of Madame Marillac.

"You will perhaps be surprised to find that I address these lines to you instead of to Mr. Romayne. The reason is soon told.

"I was acquainted with the late General—as you know—at a time when I was not aware of the company that he kept, or into the deplorable errors into which his love of gambling had betrayed him. Of his widow and his children I know absolutely nothing. Whether they have resisted the contaminating influence of the head of the household, or whether poverty and bad example combined have hopelessly degraded them, I cannot say. There is at least a doubt whether they are worthy of Mr. Romayne's benevolent intentions towards them. As an honest man, I cannot feel this doubt, and reconcile it to my conscience to be the means, however indirectly, of introducing them to Mr. Romayne. To your discretion I leave it to act for the best, after this warning."

Lord Loring returned the letter to Major Hynd.

"I agree with you," he said. "It is more than doubtful whether you would do right to communicate this information to Romayne."

Lady Loring was not quite of her husband's opinion.

"While there is a doubt about these people," she said, "it seems only just to find out what sort of character they bear in the neighborhood. In your place, Major Hynd, I should apply to the person in whose house they live, or to the tradespeople whom they have employed."

"I am obliged to leave London again to-day," the major replied; "but on my return I will certainly follow your ladyship's advice."

"And you will let us know the result?"

"With the greatest pleasure."

Major Hynd took his leave.

"I think you will be responsible for wasting the major's time," said Lord Loring, when the visitor had retired.

"I think not," said Lady Loring.

She rose to leave the room.

"Are you going out?" her husband asked.

"No. I am going up-stairs to Stella."

THURLOW WEED'S BIRTHDAY.

THE Press Club of New York made its Fall reception, on the 15th instant, the occasion of a reception in honor of the eighty-third anniversary of the birthday of the veteran journalist, Thurlow Weed. The spacious parlors of the club, at No. 121 Nassau Street, were decoratively embellished with a loan collection of paintings, gracefully entwined flags and a profusion of flowers. The pictures were hung with special reference to the festivities of the evening. The most conspicuous among them were three portraits of the historic political firm of Seward, Weed and Greeley wreathed in flags and evergreens, to which special attention was called by the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements. Near these were portraits of Washington, Cardinal McCloskey, Henry J. Raymond, Professor Morse, Stanley (the African explorer), and others, and Wilson Macdonald's heroic bust of Bryant. On the president's table, in front of the ornate easy-chairs that had been provided for Mr. Weed and General James Watson Webb, was a large bank of flowers, in which appeared in crimson the one word "Age"—meaning age surrounded by fragrant and beautiful memories. The billiard-room was made a restaurant, the billiard tables being covered with boards and converted into an extensive table.

More than two hundred guests responded to the invitations of the club, including General James Watson Webb, Erastus Brooks, Postmaster James, Whitelaw Reid, David M. Stone, the Rev. Dr. Henry Highland Garnet, Professor John A. Weisse, Benson J. Lossing, Professor J. E. Frobisher, Salmi Morse, Thurlow Weed Barnes, Colonel John Farrell, United States Consul at Gloucester; J. B. Smiley, Robert J. Burdette and Captain George B. Haycock, of the United States Army. Letters of regret were received from George William Curtis, William Henry Hurlbert, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Mark Twain, B. P. Shillaber, the Rev. Dr. S. Irenæus Prime, George W. Childs, Hugh J. Hastings, James Parton, Daniel G. Mitchell, Frederick W. Seward, Colonel Forney, and other well-known gentlemen. Mr. Weed, who reached the club-rooms shortly after eight o'clock, was escorted to a seat beside President Penny. The next place of honor was assigned to General Webb, and around him and Mr. Weed were grouped the gentlemen whose names have been mentioned as included in the list of guests. Mr. J. W. Simonton, in presenting Mr. Weed to the assembled company, said it might be doubted whether any man now living "other than this much-loved Nestor of the press" had ever exercised so wide and deep an influence upon the destinies of the country. While others had been able and wise and patriotic, Mr. Weed, more than any others in the journalistic profession, had recognized that, as the Creator was greater than the creature, so the king-maker was greater than the king, at least in the power of usefulness. Mr. Weed had always professed to be a conscientious king-maker, rather than to sit upon the throne and wield its sceptre. Mr. Simonton reviewed the career of the honored guest of the evening as a soldier, printer, journalist and statesman. The journalists of New York, he added, had reason to feel justly proud of their friend and co-laborer. His life story was familiar to all as an indestructible part of the brilliant record of American statesmanship and journalism during more than half the whole life of the American Republic.

Mr. Weed was deeply affected by the remarks of Mr. Simonton, and did not attempt to essay a response until after brief addresses had been delivered by General James Watson Webb, Erastus Brooks, Whitelaw Reid and Robert J. Burdette. After these gentlemen had spoken, he rose simply to relate an incident suggested by a remark of one of the speakers, touching the circumstances of his first meeting with Horace Greeley. He said that in 1837, anticipating an earnest and active canvass for the Presidency, the Whig State Committee determined to establish a campaign newspaper, until that time unheard of. He came to New York and found Horace Greeley, with his shirt-sleeves rolled up, at the case. Mr. Greeley dropped his composing-stick, and Mr. Weed asked who wrote certain articles on American industry—on Protection—in the New Yorker, then published by Horace Greeley. Mr. Greeley replied that he wrote them. "Then you are the man we want. Come to dinner with me in the City Hotel." Mr. Greeley had been to dinner, but he met the Chairman of the State Committee and Mr. Weed in the City Hotel, and it was arranged that he should spend two days a week in Albany and edit the Jeffersonian. This was the origin of a friendship that was continued harmoniously for many years—the origin of the firm of Seward, Weed and Greeley.

Mr. Brooks, in his remarks, said: "Mr. Weed has been an observer of most of the striking incidents in the life of this nation. It is something to remember that he has lived under all the eighteen Presidents of this nation. He was a child during the administration of Washington. With the majority he has been on terms of intimacy. Of the twenty-five Governors of New York, he has voted for nearly all. He has witnessed more of the chances and changes of life than fall to the lot of most men."

George Dawson, Mr. Weed's oldest apprentice, and for very many years his associate on the Albany Evening Journal, spoke at length, giving reminiscences of Mr. Weed's early days, his unfailing benevolence to needy printers and others, and the sagacity which he evinced in all public affairs at an early age.

After speeches by the Rev. Henry Highland Garnet, Mr. William E. Robinson (Mr. Greeley's "Richelieu"), Algernon S. Sullivan, Postmaster James and David M. Stone, recitations by Mr. Charles Roberts, Jr., and Mr. E. P. Burbank, and music, the club and its guests proceeded to the supper-room, where the festivities of the evening happily terminated.

Mr. Weed's birthday was also recognized by hundreds of friends who called at his residence to tender their congratulations, and many letters and telegrams were received. All the callers were received in the cozy reception-room, which was fragrant with the perfume of flowers. One of the handsomest floral designs sent to the octogenarian was the representation of a very large horseshoe, with a shield of red, white and blue in the centre. One of the smallest floral tokens was a simple bouquet, which Mr. Weed received enthusiastically. It came from a lady whose grandfather, Edmund M. Blunt, was editor of the Nantucket Herald in 1797, the year in which Mr. Weed was born. Mr. Weed said he remembered the paper very well. Miss Bell, a daughter of what was formerly one of the richest and most influential families of the State of Georgia, and who, since the war, has been obliged to earn her own living, sent Mr. Weed a beautiful piece of embroidery. Mr. Weed said he first became acquainted with the family about forty years ago. Five of Mr. Weed's grandchildren sent him a large basket of the finest fruit, with an affectionate message attached. This basket of fruit was placed upon an immense silver salver and given a conspicuous place in the room. This salver was presented to him by a number of the leading merchants of New York in 1854, when Mr. Weed was editor of the Albany Evening Journal. The salver is over three feet long, of solid silver, and weighs fourteen pounds. It is an elaborate piece of artistic workmanship.

KENWARD PHILP,

OF THE "CHINESE LETTER FORGERY."

KENWARD PHILP, whose portrait from a photograph we print herewith, is one of the best known of the younger journalists of New York. He was born in London thirty-three years ago, his father, now one of the editors of the London Standard, being then a newspaper man, as had been his grandfather and great-grandfather. If there be such a thing as hereditary adaptability to a profession, therefore, Mr. Philp is clearly entitled to rank as a journalist by descent.

Before coming to America in 1865, he had already entered actively upon the duties of his profession, contributing to a monthly magazine and filling the post of London correspondent of more than one provincial paper. In New York City his first employment was upon the Daily News, then a morning daily. The Fenian agitation was at that time at its height, and with a grim humor that on one occasion came near costing Philp his life, the city editor assigned the young Englishman to report the fiery speeches of the Irish patriots. At a crowded meeting at Military Hall in the Bowery, the unmistakable English look and dress of the News reporter attracted the attention of one of the orators, who forthwith denounced him as a spy. But for the prompt intervention of Captain Hogan, one of the staunchest of Fenians and himself a journalist, there would be no occasion now to publish Philp's portrait.

From the Daily News he went into the service of the New York Herald, where he was for some time the preferred descriptive writer on the staff, attending races and regattas going up in balloons and winning encomiums from the elder Bennett and Mr. Frederic Hudson, then in charge of the paper. On one occasion he was sent from New York to St. Louis to report a prize-fight for the championship. When he arrived he found the fight had been postponed for a week. To return to New York and immediately start back again for St. Louis would have been absurd, so, wanting something to send to his paper, he invited the Press of St. Louis and the Mayor and Corporation to a dinner in the name of the New York Herald. The affair occurred at the Lindell House, and cost Mr. Bennett six hundred dollars. "However," said Mr. Philp, "I had to keep up the credit of the paper, you know." When the fight did occur, the Herald had five columns of it, and not another paper in the country east of Cincinnati had a line—a triumph that was the result of a little arrangement between a telegraph-operator and the Herald correspondent. Mr. Bennett, senior, declared with much emotion that the six hundred dollar dinner was by no means wasted. Mr. Philp resigned from the Herald in 1867, and became an editorial writer for the Brooklyn Eagle, a post he quitted to become managing editor of the Brooklyn Union, under Theodore Tilton. His success in this position was admitted, but the Beecher scandal broke out, and Philp, who at that time lived in Tilton's house, conveniently went to Europe. Returning, he became dramatic critic and editorial writer for the Eagle once more, and was one of the five original promoters of the Brooklyn Sun, which became so marked a power in Brooklyn that the Eagle people bought it. Relieved of daily newspaper work by the change, Mr. Philp turned his attention to dramatic matters, produced four or five successful burlesques in rapid succession, and became business manager of the Madison Square Theatre. Subsequent to this, he wrote regularly for the Dramatic News, and became one of the editors of Truth, to which journal he has contributed hundreds of political articles.

During his fifteen years' sojourn in this country, Mr. Philp has written thirty-seven complete novels of from fifty to two hundred columns each, contributing at one period no fewer than three "instalments" a week to the story papers. Some of these stories, though not of a high imaginative order, have been very popular. During each Summer, for the past four years, he has also edited the Coney Island Sun, and throughout his career here has been constantly employed in dramatic matters. He wrote the "opening" to "Humpty Dumpty," in which Fox, the clown, was so successful, and is credited with a new piece for the Salsbury Troubadours. Add to these various employments stories and sketches for various journals, the night editorship of the Star for two years, the establishment of a paper called the Brooklyn Sunday News, contributions to the Boulder, the Prop'l, "Eminent Americans," and a score of minor engagements of a literary character, and one will not be able to deny to Mr. Philps a tolerably busy record as a newspaper man.

A great deal has been said during the Chinese letter trial concerning Mr. Philp's penchant for practical joking. An attaché of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER met the subject of this sketch a day or two since, and questioned him concerning it.

"Oh, that's all in the sweet long ago," said Mr. Philp. "I have had my day as a joker. I'm married."

"What do you think will be the result of the trial?" he was asked.

"I am sure I don't know," he replied, "and I am getting so that I don't much care. But kindly mention one thing in any little notice you may write about me. That is, that nobody has shown the smallest incentive to, or consideration for, such a crime as I am charged with. If, in addition to doing an ordinary newspaper man's work for an ordinary newspaper man's salary, I have got to throw in an occasional forgery, I think I shall get out of the business!"

Whether Mr. Philp is in fact the author of the celebrated "Chinese Letter" is yet to be shown.

THE LATE LUCRETIA MOTT.

MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT, the well-known philanthropist, reformer and preacher, died at her residence in Cheltenham Township, Montgomery County, Pa., on November 11th, having attained the ripe age of eighty-seven years. She was born on the quaint little island of Nantucket, among a population of Quaker sailors and fishermen. Her father was Thomas Coffin, one of a famous race of sea captains, descended from the stock of the English admiral Coffin, and her mother, Anna Folger, came of a line which included the family of that Boston tallow-chandler whose son was Benjamin Franklin. In 1804 her father removed to Boston, "and in the public and private schools of that city," says Lucretia, "I mingled with all classes without distinction." Her father was a plain man and a strict Friend. He desired his children to be brought up in the Order of the society and trained to habits of useful industry. When she was fourteen he sent Lucretia and a younger sister to a Friends' "boarding school" in Dutchess County, N. Y., and there, pursuing her studies with patient zeal, she remained two years without going once home for holiday or vacation. At fifteen, a teacher having left, she was made an assistant, and at the end of the second year she was tendered the place of teacher, with the inducement, besides, that her services would entitle a younger sister to her education. In the Spring of 1809 she joined her father's family in Philadelphia, whither they had removed, and here, to the end of her remarkable life, she continued to reside. When eighteen years of age she was married to James Mott, then engaged in business with her father. At the age of twenty-five she began to preach in the meetings of the Friends, and she pursued then, as she diligently continued throughout her life, the habit of "searching the Scriptures daily," so that her acquaintance with them became wonderfully complete. In 1834 she took an active part in the formation of the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, and traveled extensively to call attention to its work, holding meetings in some of the Slave States. From this time forward to the proclamation by Lincoln her part was one of the most prominent among the Abolitionists. Garrison was scarcely more famous or more abused than Lucretia Mott. In 1840 the World's Anti-Slavery Convention was called to assemble in London, and the Pennsylvania Society sent over among its delegates Lucretia Mott, Mary Grew, Abby Kimber, Elizabeth Neall and Sarah Pugh, the Massachusetts Society sending Emily Winslow, Abby Southwick and Anne Greene Phillips, the last named being the just-married wife of Wendell Phillips. The convention, however, adhering to English ideas, refused to admit women, after a hot debate, in which Daniel O'Connell, Dr. Bowring, George Thompson and Wendell Phillips earnestly advocated their cause, and they consequently took no part in its proceedings. William Lloyd Garrison was so indignant that he withdrew from the convention and remained only as a spectator. This was Lucretia Mott's only visit to England, but she established there many friendships that continued during life, and her home was the frequent place of a cheerful and refined hospitality to distinguished visitors from abroad.

She has always regularly attended the religious meetings of the Friends, and has been an unfailing speaker at all sorts of gatherings in the interest of peace, temperance, the Indians, the colored people, women's progress, etc., etc., and seldom has been permitted to remain silent. In January, 1868, her husband, James Mott, himself a man of much character, force and intellectual ability, died, the wedded life of himself and wife having extended beyond the unusual period of half a century.

Resources of Washington Territory.

THERE are in the Territory about 20,000,000 acres of the finest timber-land that stands upon the face of the earth. These forests lie on Puget Sound, and are accessible by the Sound and by their streams running to the ocean. The most common trees are the pine and fir. The latter averages 300 feet, and many of them are 500 feet in height and 12 feet in diameter at the base. One stick of timber is represented to have been hewed in these woods 124 feet in length, and squaring 36 inches at the small end, free from sap. This vast timber belt has been cut into but little. The laws of the United States are very stringent to prevent the waste of timber, and an agent has been appointed especially for this Territory to prevent the waste of this timber treasure. Eastern Washington consists of 11,000,000 acres of grazing prairie land. On this land grows a bunch-grass, which is very nutritious, and vegetates during ten months of the year. During the remaining two months it stands in a dry condition, and cattle feed upon it with the best of results. Five million acres are wheat-growing land, which produced, according to the statistical reports of this last year, thirty-five bushels of wheat to the acre. Many instances are known where the production went as high as seventy or eighty bushels to the acre. In the mountains, and in fact in every county in the Territory, it is represented officially by Governor Ferry that coal is found near the surface of a very superior quality. Iron is accessible and of very good quality in all portions of the three main ranges of mountains, the Coast, Olympic and Cascade. In the northern portion of the Cascade range, on the Skagit River, gold has been discovered to be very abundant, the miners making on an average $5 per day. The water advantages of Washington Territory are unequaled in any other portion of the world. This Territory is bounded on the west by the Pacific Ocean, on the south by the Columbia River, which divides it from Oregon, and partially on the North by Puget Sound, which penetrates it from that direction, and separates it from the British possessions.

Puget Sound covers an area of 2,000 square miles. The water of the sound is deep, and the shores are bold, so much so that vessels of the largest size can go directly up the sound seventy miles or more and find safe anchorage. It is free from rocks and bars, and is pacific at all seasons of the year. High winds never prevail. They have recently taken to planting and cultivating Eastern oysters there. The product is an excellent oyster, and the probability is that Washington Territory will become the great oyster-producing section of the Pacific Coast. Clams of the soft-shelled variety have been found in great abundance and of monstrous growth, some of them weighing from seven to ten pounds each. There are eighty-five varieties of fish in Puget Sound. The catch of salmon during the last year was 40,000,000 pounds. It is canned and sent to nearly all the markets of the world. The returns to those engaged in salmon taking and packing amounted to over $3,000,000. The drying of cod is carried on very extensively. The gadus, a species of cod, is very abundant. It is larger than cod, and of finer flavor. Fish can be dried better there than anywhere else on the Pacific Coast, or the Atlantic either, for that matter, because further north it is too cold, and further south too dry. They can be cured and sent to market in a more moist condition there than cod can in Maine. Upon the coast are two harbors, Gray's and Shoal Harbors. There are few inlets on the Pacific Coast of the United States north of San Francisco, with the exception of the mouth of the Columbia and Puget Sound, so that that Territory monopolizes nearly all the harbors on this coast of our country. The Columbia River affords navigable water 725 miles in extent, with its tributaries. Navigation is uninterrupted, with the exception of the cascades in the river, about 150 miles from its mouth, called the Dalles, around which navigation is had by rail. The Government of the United States made an appropriation for the purpose of excavating these obstructions, and in a very few years it is quite certain that we shall have uninterrupted communication through the Columbia River to Eastern Washington.

There are fifty rivers in the Territory, more or less, many of them cascade rivers running from the west into Puget Sound, affording great facilities for manufacturers, which in the future are sure to come, because, in addition to the natural resources of wood, iron and coal, the raising of great numbers of sheep now affords an immense crop of wool, which will be utilized at home instead of being exported. The best agricultural portions are found in Eastern Washington, the centre of which is Walla Walla, one of the largest and most flourishing towns in the Territory. The climate is delightful and uniform. All accounts agree on that point. The temperature rarely falls below 30 above zero in Winter, and seldom goes above 70 in the Summer. They have a rainy season and a dry season, the former beginning in October and continuing until Spring, the latter covering the remaining months of the year, so that the wheat harvest is always completed during the dry season. The population is 85,000 white people, chiefly native-born Americans, emigrants from California, Oregon, New York, Indiana and Kentucky. The Indians number 18,000, and live on reservations in the northern and western portions.

A Terrible Calamity.

THE State Insane Asylum at St. Peter, Minn., was partially burned on Monday night, Nov. 15th, and a large number of lives lost, variously estimated from ten to twenty. There were in all 600 inmates, and the scenes at the burning of the hospital were heart-rending in the extreme. The patients in the annex wing were males. Many of them refused to leave the building at all. They ran up and down the halls screaming and crying. Of course those who could not be coaxed or forced out of the building were suffocated, or suffered a horrible death in the pit of the flames. The others were saved, some by ladders and some by leaping from the windows. Some were nearly nude, some shoeless and hatless, and all were exposed to the exceeding cold of the night. Many of the poor, demented and crazed inmates ran shrieking into the snow-drifts, in their night-clothes, even burying themselves in the snow, and had to be dragged into the barns and sheds, while those near by wrapped blankets and shawls around them. The hospital occupied ten years in building, and was completed three years ago, at a cost of $500,000. The loss by the fire will be from $100,000 to $150,000, on which there is no insurance. The cause of the fire is unknown.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It is Reported that, on a recent visit to New Guinea, Captain Lawson made the interesting geographical discovery that Mount Hercules has an altitude of 22,786 feet, thus being more than 3,000 feet higher than Mount Everest, which has for a considerable time been regarded as the tallest mountain in the world.

A French Savant, M. Lallman, has found that an oil can be distilled from American grape-vines, which will not congeal at any temperature above eight degrees Fahrenheit, while other oils are solid at twenty-seven degrees. He therefore concludes that this oil must be valuable for watch-making and similar purposes.

An Important Innovation has been made in all the French colleges by M. Ferry. Any pupil wishing to be promoted to a superior class is obliged to pass an examination. The Government is asking important credits for the rebuilding of the principal colleges of Paris and the construction of new colleges outside of the fortifications.

Large Quantities of Pottery are manufactured in Brazil from the hard, siliceous bark of the caraipe-tree, in the process, the ashes of the bark are powdered and mixed with the purest clay that can be obtained from the beds of the rivers—this kind being preferred, as it takes up a larger quantity of the ash, and thus produces a stronger kind of ware.

Very Remarkable is the growth of the trade in jute. In 1829 the export of jute from Calcutta was twenty tons only, worth about a hundred dollars. Now the quantity exported annually is three hundred and fifty thousand tons—nearly two million bales—valued at about thirty million dollars. This large quantity does not include the enormous supplies retained for use in India.

Something has been said about the possibility of taking photographs at a distance by means of the telegraph, to which operation the same electric telescopy might be given. Suppose a picture of a landscape taken in a camera; what is required is that the electric current should take up and transmit the features of that landscape, as it does modulations of sound. This once achieved, pictures might be obtained of places hundreds of miles distant.

The United States Consul at Milan, reporting on the manufacture of quinine in Italy, introduces the following sentence referring to quinine and salts of quinine: "The production of the world is estimated at from 220,000 to 250,000 lbs per year as follows—Germany, 56,250 lbs.; Italy, 45,000 lbs.; France, 45,500 lbs.; England, 27,500 lbs.; America, 25,000 lbs.; India, 12,250 lbs." According to him, efforts are being made to acclimatize the cinchona in Italy. Its successful culture in India and Ceylon encourages the belief that it will grow wherever the soil is dry, the rainfall large, and the climate temperate.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. FREDERICK O. PRINCE has been renominated for Mayor of Boston.

HON. JAMES L. PUGH has been elected United States Senator from Alabama.

GENERAL FAIRCHILD, the new American Minister to Spain, has arrived at Madrid.

A LONDON dispatch says that Mr. Bret Harte is lying seriously ill at Newstead Abbey.

M. GERARD has been appointed Second Secretary of the French Legation at Washington.

SIR FREDERIC ROBERTS, the hero of the Afghan war, is about to be entertained by Queen Victoria.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT has been elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, defeating Mr. John Ruskin by 314 votes.

MR. SPURGEON'S health has not been improved, and he will be compelled, as usual, to spend the Winter at Mentone.

REV. C. N. SIMS, of the Somerfield Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has been elected Chancellor of the Syracuse University.

TOMASO SALVINI, the Italian tragedian, arrived in New York City last week, and will play an engagement of 100 nights.

IT is announced that Mr. Lowell, the American Minister to England, has submitted to the Board of Trade the project for an international copyright treaty.

THE Italian Chamber of Deputies has refused to accept the resignations of General Garibaldi and his son, but has granted them three months' leave of absence.

CLEM CANADA, the oldest negro in Virginia, died on the 3d inst. near Guilford, in Loudon County, at the advanced age of nearly one hundred and twenty-one years.

SIR EDWARD THORNTON, British Minister to the United States, and family returned to the country by the steamer Bothnia, which arrived at New York, November 17th.

DESPITE the disturbed condition of Ireland, the Empress of Austria proposes, once more, as she has already done for two years in succession, to take her establishment and sled to Ireland and enjoy a Winter's hunting.

THE Duke of Beaufort has taken so bravely to heart the defeat of his son, Lord Dalkeith, by Mr. Gladstone that he has closed up his collieries at Bolkroth, removing 200 miners and reducing the trade of the place by $1,500 a week.

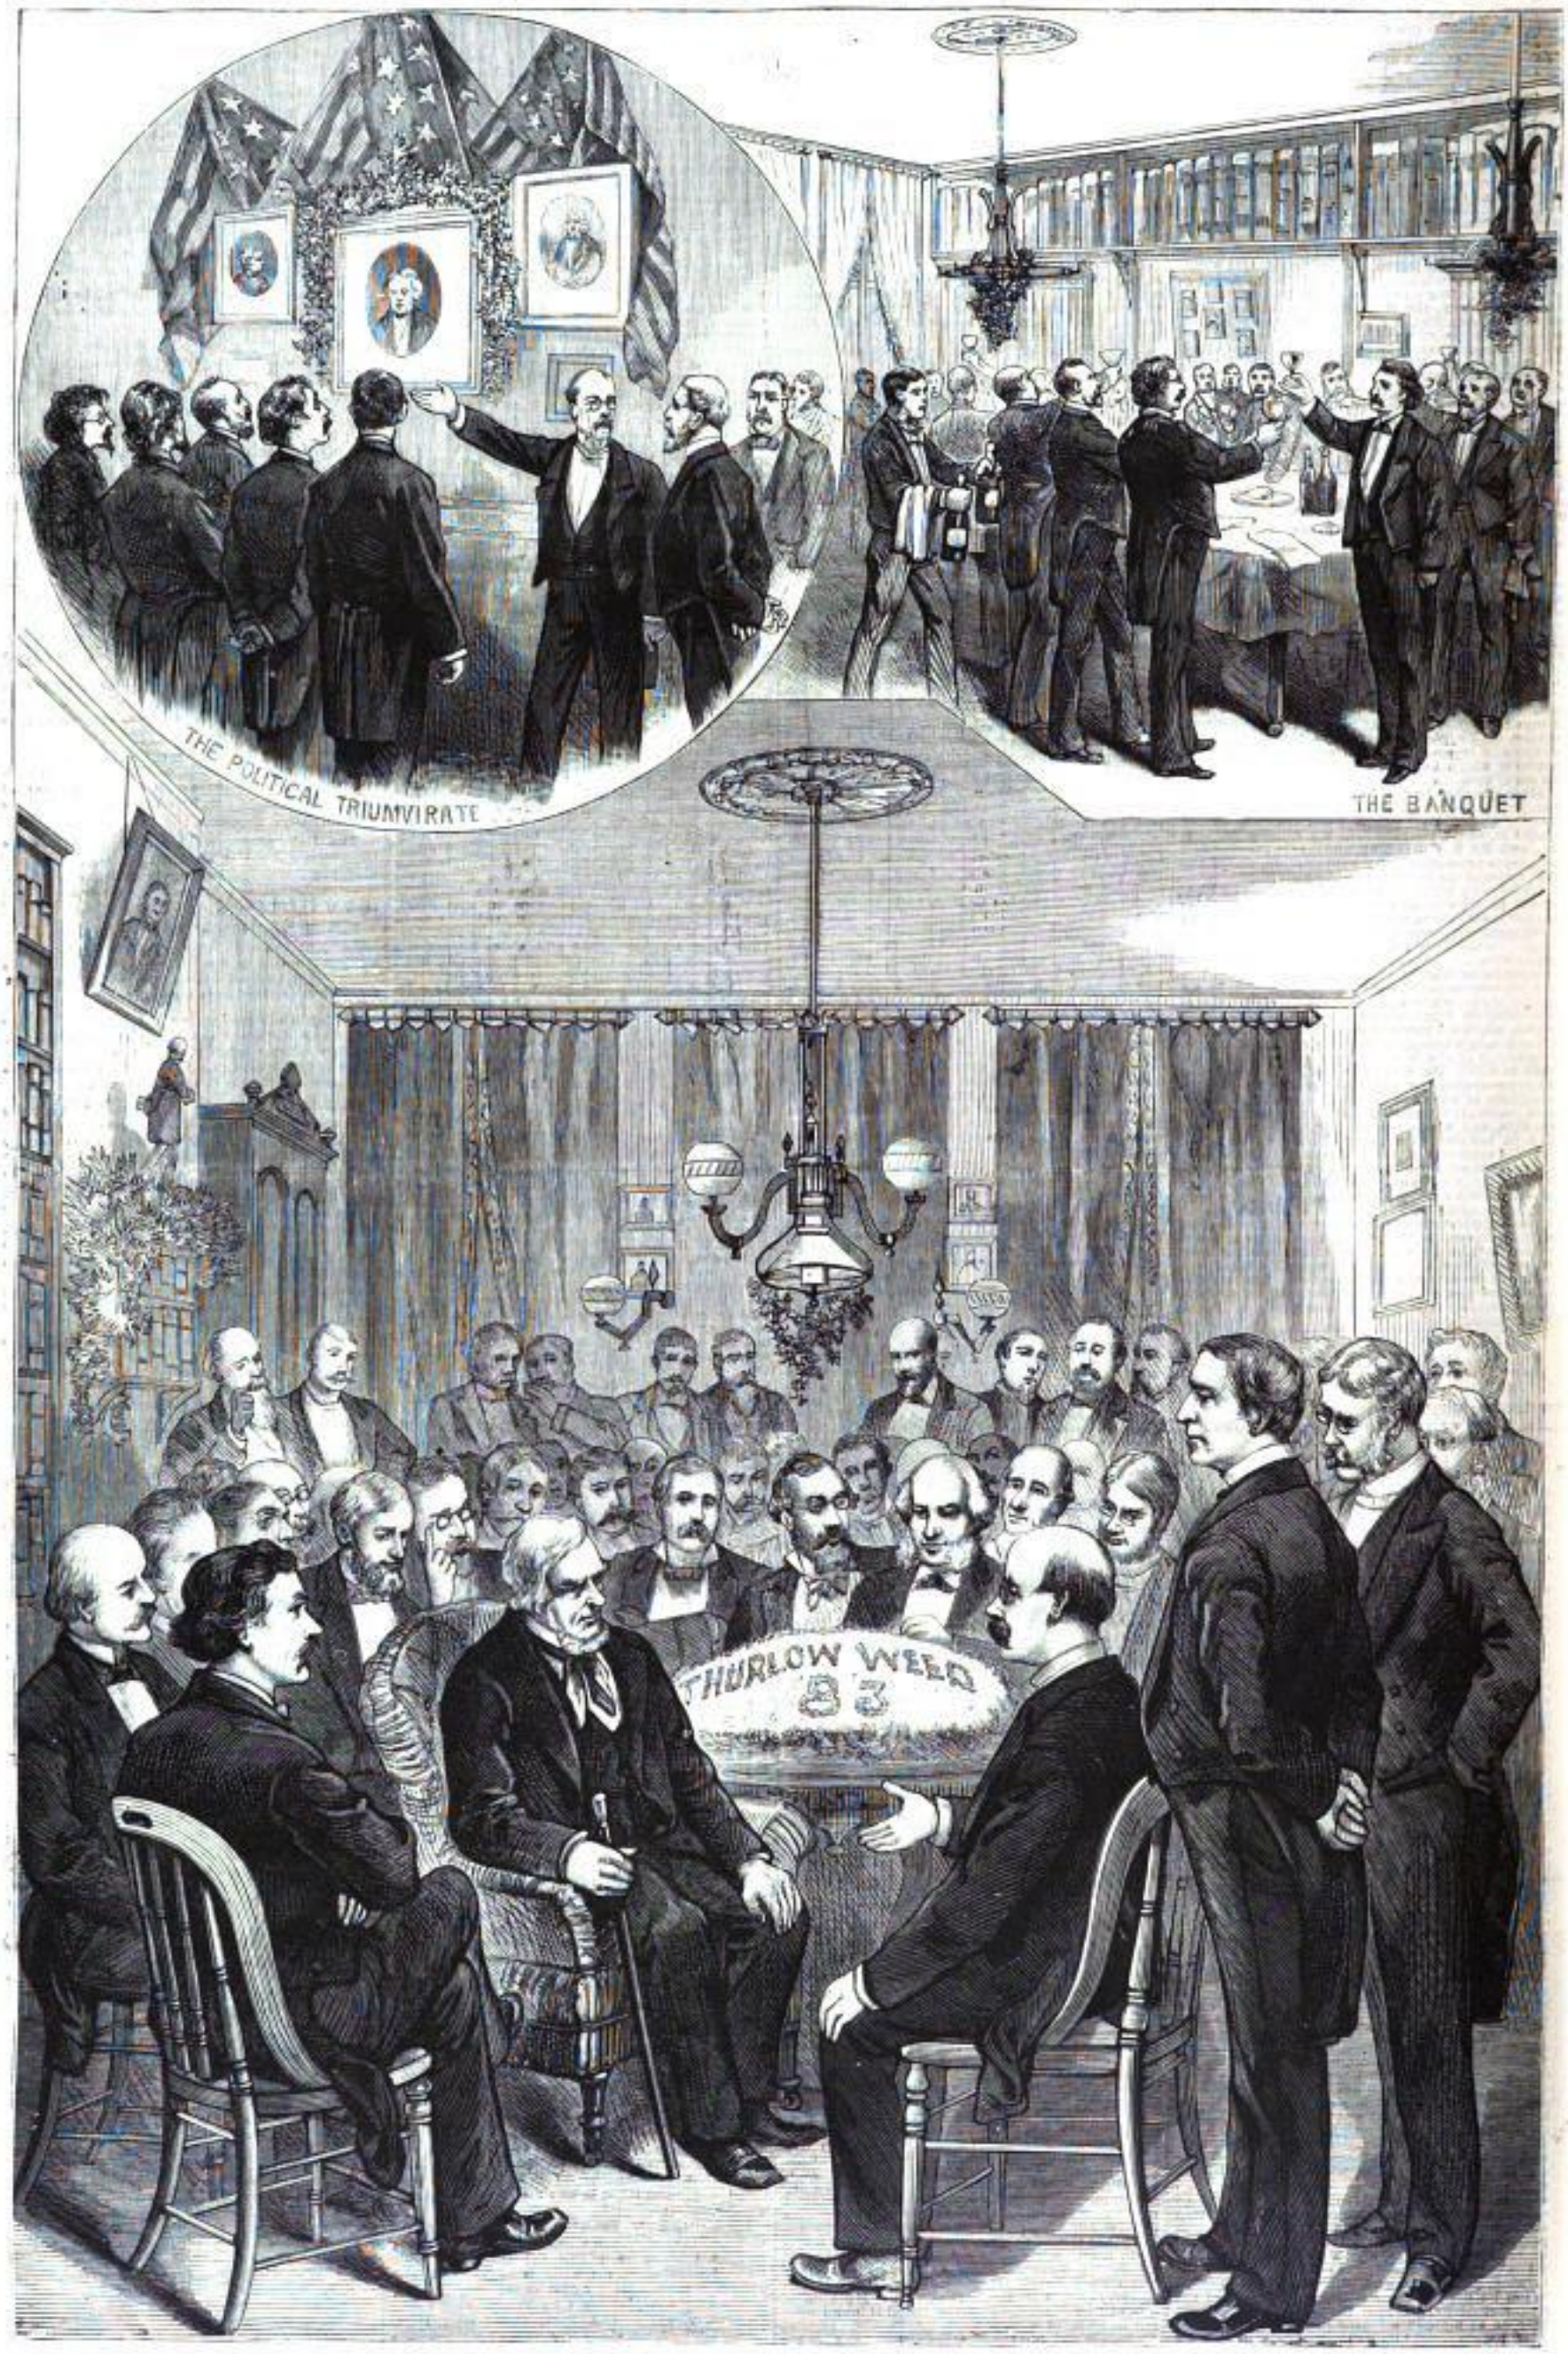
THE divorced wife of the Rev. Newman Hall has married Frank Richardson, the groom who figured so conspicuously in the divorce proceedings which ended in her husband's obtaining a decree against her. Mr. Hall was married some time ago.

MAYOR COOPER last week transmitted to the Park Commissioners of New York a tin box containing mulberry cuttings from a tree over the grave of Shakespeare at Stratford-on-Avon. The cuttings were a gift to the Mayor from Charles Reade, the novelist.

THE Count de Chambord is about to visit the Duke of Norfolk at Arundel Castle, where immense preparations are to be made for his reception. One of the motives of this visit to England is said to be to confer with the Catholic authorities as to the settlement of the religious communities driven from France.

MISS MABEL MAY, a young English lady of rare character and accomplishments, will be the companion and assistant of Mrs. General Garfield in the White House. She is a woman of unusual mental and moral stamina. Last year she was a teacher in Mrs. Westlake's Seminary, in Dayton, and won the respect and esteem of all who were fortunate enough to form her acquaintance.

THE Baroness Burdett-Coutts, in contributing $500 to the Truro Cathedral fund, mentions that Truro was the first cathedral whose foundation stone was laid with full Masonic honors, and adds: "Let us hope that this may be a type that the churches of Christendom may become more united, and convey more perfectly their Master's precepts embodied in even what the ignorant know of the principles of the craft."



THE English think that Mr. Joseph Cook has one fault which he would do well to correct—he reads so rapidly that it is difficult for an audience to follow him. The Echo says: "Mr. Cook does not allow his hearers the tenth part of a second to weigh the exact meaning of some unaccustomed word. As the English people are not all theologians or metaphysicians, Mr. Cook, as a lecturer, would do well to accommodate himself to our deficiencies."

QUEEN VICTORIA has just insured her life for a large sum. The Duke of Cambridge, who has been staying in Paris, went to the French Loss Insurance Company and took out a policy for a large amount in the name of Her Majesty. Imitating this act of foresight, the Duke proceeded next day to the office of the company and insured his own life also for a very large sum. The Queen is frugality itself, and induces her friends to put its precepts in practice. She is a considerable shareholder in one of the companies trading with the Cape.

UNITED STATES SENATOR HAMLIN, of Maine, will not press his claims for re-election. There have been very few more successful politicians in this country than Mr. Hamlin. He entered Congress almost immediately up attaining the constitutional age, having previously occupied a seat in the State Legislature, and he has been almost continuously in the public service ever since. No man in New England contributed more effectively to the success of the Republican Party in 1860. Mr. Hamlin has always had a strong and devoted personal following in his native State, due chiefly to the fact that he habitually kept his promises and never went back upon his friends. His record, public and private, has been clean throughout. No suspicion of corruption was ever whispered against him, and he will close his long career with an unblemished reputation.

BY the will of the late Mary Shields, of Philadelphia, nearly her whole estate, valued at $239,290.23, is bequeathed to charitable institutions. Deducting the amount left to the Laurel Hill Cemetery Company for keeping the Shields family vault in repair, $10,000 for purchasing coal for indigent widows, single women and men in Philadelphia, and specific legacies left to friends and former servants, there will be fully $170,000 to be divided among the following institutions: The Deaf and Dumb Asylum, the Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind, the Old Man's Home, the House of Mercy for the Care of Consumptives, the Indigent Widows' and Single Women's Asylum, the Pennsylvania Hospital and the Almshouse of the City of Philadelphia, to relieve and make comfortable the sick and insane confined therein. The first five of these institutions will each receive one-sixth of the amount devoted to charity, while the remaining sixth will be divided between the last two named. Miss Shields was descended from a family that settled in Pennsylvania in the days of the Proprietary, and at one time owned a large portion of Pike and Wayne Counties. Her father, forty years ago, was a leading hardware merchant in Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA HOME FOR INCURABLES.

TWO years ago a site was purchased at Forty-eighth Street and Woodland Avenue for the sum of $5,500, and thereon has been erected the new Home which, in its exterior appearance and its interior arrangements, is one of the most complete institution buildings in the city. It stands on an elevated piece of ground, affording not only a wide expanse of view in all directions, but combining, as well, the benefits of a healthy temperature and thorough ventilation.

Viewed from Woodland Avenue, the Home presents an imposing appearance. It stands back about fifty feet from the street pavement, and is fronted with an inclosed plot of ground, fresh-sodded with grass. It is three stories in height, and in the prevailing style of architecture, with fancy brick front, finished with ornamental tiling, with broad porches designed somewhat after the Queen Anne fashion, and with deep slanting Gothic roof covered with Akron tiles in red and buff. Fairmount stone laid with random black joints and the Dorchester gray sandstone are used also in the construction of the face of the house. The front is divided into three sections, the centre part receding, while the projecting ends are built with triple windows in the second and third stories, finishing above in towers, the finial of which is 20 feet above the roof, and in each of which there are four louvre windows. Stacks for ventilators and smoke are built with buff tile roofs. Nearly all of the windows have their upper frames set in stained glass, which enhances the brightness of the general effect. The building has a frontage of 72 feet on Woodland Avenue, exclusive of the additional length caused by the bay windows at either end. The depth of the house is 44 feet. From these dimensions some idea may be had of its form, which, as arranged interiorly, is odd and pleasing. The house is entered from a broad piazza extending the length of the front. Wide front doors open into a hall 15 by 24 feet, with grate directly opposite the entrance. The hall, as indeed is the case throughout the house, is finished in bright woods.

On the right hand on entering is a long room, admirably lighted by side windows and the bay-windows at the end. This is to be used as a reception-room and library. A duplicate room on the other side of the main corridor is to be used as a committee-room. Thrown open, these two apartments form, with the hall, a long stretch of rooms. Running perpendicularly to the main hall is a long entry, which extends the entire width of the building. Opening on this entry are all the other rooms on the floor, viz.: the dining-room, the physician's office, the matron's room and one dormitory, with storeroom, closets, etc., and two dumb-waiters, one running from the kitchen to the dining-room, and the other from the kitchen to the upper floor, to carry the meals to the patients unable to leave their rooms. There also opens on this entry the elevator closet, with passenger-elevator to carry the patients. On the rear is another broad piazza, the counterpart of that on the front of the house.

On the upper floors are the rooms for the patients. They are all capacious, well-lighted and ventilated by a patent process. The heating of the house will be by steam and indirect radiation. Each room on the third story has a register in the ceiling for Summer ventilation, which has its outlet in the tower dormers. The drainage of the house is said to be complete in every respect. In the basement are the kitchen, laundry and servants' quarters. The entire cost of the building is $35,000. It will accommodate forty patients. It is contemplated, if the institution meets with popular indorsement and substantial aid, to add to the main building two wings for male as well as female patients, and designed also to provide for such cases as epilepsy, consumption and cancer.

PENNSYLVANIA.—NEW BUILDING OF THE HOME FOR INCURABLES, PHILADELPHIA.—FROM THE PLANS OF W. G. HALE, ARCHITECT.

PHILANTHROPY ON WHEELS.

REV. J. KENNION has recently introduced a form of charity which is likely to be immensely popular. His purpose is to place within the reach of every needy person, as far as practicable, a cup or more of hot coffee and a reasonable proportion of wholesome bread, "without money and without price." He does this from a four-wheeled cart, four feet long and two and a half feet wide, which is painted red and blue, and appears on the streets ornamented with the American, English, French and German flags. From the sides of the cart are suspended ten thick stone-china cups; in the front is a basket capable of holding thirty loaves of bread, and in the rear a ten-gallon urn, painted red and capped with copper. A large red flag floating from a pole attached to the front of the cart proclaims, in white letters, "Coffee and Bread Free for All." Mr. Kennion, in a circular recently issued, says: "The coffee cart plan has been grandly and successfully systematized in England among temperance organizations of a true, honorable and practical character, by societies of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and by others. We intend to put this enterprise on a solid footing, which will regularly and amply supply the needy of these cities, worthy and unworthy alike; all will be welcome to a good cup of our coffee with a reasonable proportion of good and wholesome bread. This is better than 'physical culture,' dense denunciatory reproach and abuse of the drunkard; better than prohibitionary laws; better than mean clandestine key hole busy-bodying and sham detective spies prowling about for blackmailing game. We cannot compel men to be temperate, or sober, or total abstainers, by any force or power of man; but we can, by kindness, loving persuasiveness and material aid, so win the affections of the sot, that he will become emollient, esteem us and our methods, and be readily led to the friend who turns away none because they are poor."

ARCHITECTURAL PROGRESS OF NEW YORK CITY.

THE CARDINAL'S NEW RESIDENCE.

THE new residence of Cardinal McCloskey, on the northwest corner of Madison Avenue and Fiftieth Street, now rapidly approaching completion, is of as modest a plan and character of embellishment as will be consistent with the over-towering grandeur of the great Cathedral on the Fifth Avenue side of the same block. The foundations are laid on the native rock, and the superstructure is of marble, with lines corresponding with those of the basilica. The building is four stories in height, with a basement, about fifty-five feet wide and sixty-five deep, and is fitted with the latest improvements designed to secure fresh air, thorough ventilation and sunshine. There the Cardinal will reside, with the members of his ecclesiastical family around him, including Bishop Corrigan, the newly-appointed coadjutor. This section will be still further improved by the erection, on the opposite corner of the Cathedral lot, at Madison Avenue and Fifty-first Street, of a chapel, similar in style and material to the Cathedral and the Cardinal's residence.

FUN.

THERE will be a great deal of suffering in Iowa this year among the potato-bugs. The frost has killed the potatoes.

PRECEPTOR (after a lecture): "Now, what are the principal things that are obtained from the earth?" Pupil (and disciple of Izaak Walton): "Worms, sir!"

A POET asks: "Have you lived the songs you sing, love?" If he sings "We won't go home till morning," no doubt he has lived at least one of them.

MRS. PLAINDAME, after looking long and thoughtfully at a plaster cast of Shakespeare, remarked: "Poor man! How pale he was! He couldn't have been well when it was taken."

ELDERLY LADY (to shoemaker): "It's not so much a durable article that I require, Mr. Crispin. I want something dainty, you know—something coy, and at the same time just a wee bit saucy."

IN a few weeks young women who have not opened the family Bible for months will begin to display a great interest in the sacred volume. They will gaze into it a dozen times a day to see how their Autumn leaves are pressing.

A LONG-WINDED lawyer lately defended a criminal unsuccessfully, and during the trial the judge received the following note: "The prisoner humbly prays that the time occupied by the plea of the counsel for the defense be counted in his sentence."

LITTLE Jeanne has a sister, a year married. Last week this sister became the mother of a pretty babe. "Look, mademoiselle," said the nurse, showing the new-born to its little aunt. "Isn't it the prettiest doily you ever saw?" Jeanne danced with delight. Then she approached to take it from the nurse's arms. A cry of disgust arose. "Pooh! screamed Jeanne, "it's nothing but a meat baby."

IT was in a Bowery opera-house. The two gentlemen were from the country. After the curtain fell on the first act, one of them, who had been reading the programme, said in an excited manner: "It's an infernal swindle, just got up to take in strangers." "What's a swindle?" "Here it says the next act is two years later. I wonder if they think we are going to stay in New York, at two dollars a day, for two years, just to see this thing out?" They went out and saw the ticket man about it.

A GALVESTON gentleman has been sick for some time, but finally recovered enough to take a ride along the beach in a hired hack. The hack-driver was very accommodating and attentive, and when the invalid was helped out, he expressed his appreciation of Jehu's services, remarking that he would need him again. "Yes, you look like you would need me once more; but you ought to mention my name to the undertaker at once, and not put it off till the very last moment," was the cheerful response of the driver, who had an eye to business.

THACKERAY, during his memorable visit to America, expressed the most unbounded liking for our hotels, though himself the most conservative of Britons. We can scarcely wonder at this when measuring by the standard of the ST NICHOLAS HOTEL, of New York. This great establishment is even better than in Thackeray's day, for it has kept in the van of every modern improvement. Its table, apartments, conveniences, etc., are unsurpassed.

MESSRS. FISK & HATCH, the well-known bankers of this city, in order to answer in convenient form numerous inquiries relative to the present condition and traffic of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, the improvements and connections now in progress, and for information concerning the securities of the Company, have published a convenient pamphlet which serves very completely the purpose for which it is intended. It will be found also of great value to a wider circle than those immediately interested in the Chesapeake and Ohio; much of its information bears directly upon the important questions of the industrial progress and development of the South. The pamphlet is an excellent model for other capitalists, interested in similar enterprises, to imitate.

THOUSANDS are now feeling the effects of this depressing weather, and experience a loss of appetite, loss of red blood, have become pale, and are very languid. KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Extended vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.
Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.
The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."
An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.
The author refers, by permission, to HON. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.
Address, DR. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience. HEAL THYSELF

A BURDEN RIGHTLY LIFTED.

DR SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

Fac-simile of Brush.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Made of Pure Bristles, not wires—elegantly Mounted and Carved Back.

Which has won its way to Royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

IT IS WARRANTED TO

CURE NERVOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE BILIOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE NEURALGIA IN 5 MINUTES!!
PREVENT FALLING HAIR AND BALDNESS!!
CURE DANDRUFF & DISEASES OF THE SCALP!!
PROMPTLY ARRESTS PREMATURE GRAYNESS!!
MAKES THE HAIR GROW LONG & GLOSSY!!
IMMEDIATELY SOOTHES THE WEARY BRAIN!!
MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

IT RARELY FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, WHERE THE GLANDS and FOLLICLES ARE NOT TOTALLY DESTROYED.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London.
New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From the Mayor of Saratoga.]
August 12, 1880.

"I cheerfully testify to the merits of Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush. It cures my headaches within a few minutes. I am so pleased with it I purchased another for my wife. It is an excellent Hair Brush, well worth the price, aside from its curative powers."
JAS. B. CHAPMAN.

[From Rev. Dr. Bridgeman.]
Brooklyn, June 1st, 1881.

"Gents:—I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and also finds it a prompt and infallible remedy.

Pierce, and other favorite writers, two original poems, and among its illustrations will include two double-page pictures, one entitled, "A Nineteenth Century Christmas in an Old Ladies' Home," and the other, "A Fifteenth Century Christmas Tournament"; "Nuns Dressing up the Crib for Christmas," "The Salutation on Christmas Morn," "The Dream of Sister Agnes," etc. Persons desiring the extra Holiday Number should send in their orders at once. Single copies, 15 cents each.*

A GREAT OPEN QUESTION.

IT is agreed on all hands that the mode provided in the Federal Constitution for the election of the President and Vice-President of the United States is, both in theory and in practice, the least satisfactory part of that instrument. The theory of the Constitution has been rendered null and void by the practice under it, and the practice under it is beset by anomalies and uncertainties which at two distinct epochs in our political history have brought the Government to the verge of dissolution and the people to the brink of civil strife. After the first of these epochs (the doubtful Presidential election of 1800-1), an attempt was made to cure the defects then experienced by the adoption of the Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution; but that amendment, without serving at all to bring our political practices into correspondence with the theory of the electoral office, has left both theory and practice at loose ends in the critical matter of counting the electoral ballots and of deciding as to their genuineness in disputed cases.

As the country has just turned this "sharp corner" in its political fabric without either collision or serious threat of friction, but as this good fortune has been contingent on the course of events rather than on the settled appointments of our organic law, it would seem an appropriate time, now that the question can be considered without the bias of partisan profit or advantage, that the attention of statesmen in the ranks of both the great parties of the country should be called to this matter of fundamental concern.

The question at issue is still an open one in the higher politics of the nation, and though it has been twice "settled" by the provisions of the Constitution, these "settlements" have raised new questions in the act of composing the old ones. And that the reader may clearly see how many and how great are the difficulties which environ the subject, we will begin its discussion by inviting his attention to a brief historical review of the hesitations and vacillations of opinion which prevailed among the framers of the Constitution in the Convention of 1787 so long as this matter was pending before them.

That Convention was organized on the 25th of May in that year, and three days afterwards Mr. Edmund Randolph submitted to it an outline draught of the salient features which were, in his judgment, to be desired in the new Federal system. In this draught it was proposed that the Executive should be chosen by the National Legislature, and when the matter came up for debate, on the 1st of June, as many different opinions were revealed as there were different speakers who participated in the debate. On the next day it was proposed by Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, that the States should be divided into a certain number of districts, and that the electors chosen by the people of these districts should select the President without the intervention of the States. This proposition was negatived by the vote of eight States against two, and the provision contained in Randolph's draught was affirmed by a similar vote. On the 9th of June Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, moved that the National Executive should be elected by the Executives of the several States. On the 18th of June Alexander Hamilton submitted the projet of a constitution, in which it was suggested that the President should be chosen by electors appointed by the people within certain districts. On the 17th of July following, these conflicting propositions were brought to a test on the motion to substitute "election by the people" for "election by the National Legislature." The motion was lost—only one State voting yea and nine States voting nay. Mr. Luther Martin, of Maryland, thereupon moved that the President should be chosen by electors appointed by the State Legislatures, but the motion failed—ayes 2, nays 8—and the question recurring on the original motion, that the President should be chosen by the National Legislature, it was passed unanimously.

But this was a settlement which settled nothing. Two days afterwards the Convention voted—ayes 8, nays 2—that the President should be elected by electors appointed by the State Legislatures. And four days afterwards—that is, on the 23d of July—this motion was reconsidered, and on the following day the Convention reverted to the original plan of electing the President by Congress. "Of all possible plans" this mode of appointment was denounced by Governor Morris and others as "the worst." "There are objections against every mode that has been, or perhaps can be, proposed," exclaimed Mr. Madison. Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, proposed that the President should be appointed by fifteen members of the National Legislature chosen by lot. The suggestion marks the despair to which the Convention had been brought.

On the 24th of August Mr. Wilson made an attempt to strike out by "the Legislature" and to insert by "the people" as the mode of electing the President. This motion was lost—yeas 2, nays 9. On the same day it was moved by Governor Morris that the President "should be chosen by electors," but the motion failed, the States being equally divided on it. On the 31st of August the whole subject, with others, was referred to a special committee for digest and report. This committee reported in substance the plan which was finally adopted for choosing a President and Vice-President by electors, who should vote for two persons, with the provision that the person receiving the highest number of votes should be President, the person receiving the next highest number to be Vice-President. But in case no person had a majority of all the votes, it was provided that the Senate should elect the President from the five highest on the list. The residuary power vested in the Senate by this plan being open to grave exceptions in the minds of many, it was moved by Roger Sherman that, in case of a failure to elect the President by a majority of the electors, the House of Representatives, and not the Senate, should choose him from among the five highest on the list. The motion prevailed—yeas 10, nays 1. On the 7th of September it was decided, on motion of Elbridge Gerry, that a majority of all the States should be necessary to the choice of a President by the House, and it was in this final shape that the whole subject was referred to the "Committee on Style" for the purpose of being reduced to the precise and orderly statement which it received in the Constitution as adopted by the Convention and ratified by the States.

Such, then, was the long agony which, from the 29th of May to the 7th of September, attended the gestation of this topic. Opinions on the subject were almost as many as the members who composed the body, and hence we find conflicting motions to choose the President by a direct vote of the people at large; by a direct vote of the people in each of the States (each State voting for its favorite candidate with an ultimate choice by Congress); by a direct vote of Congress; by a vote of the State Legislatures; by a vote of the State Executives; by electors chosen for the purpose in the several States; by popular vote, each citizen voting for three candidates (to prevent the concentration of the larger States on a single candidate); and, finally, by lottery, in a variety of forms. There seemed no end to the mazes of opinion in which the Convention was lost. And this brief review has been given not only for its interest as history, but also for the light it sheds on the structural ideas which must needs enter into every determination of this fundamental question in our polity.

For every decision of a question so fundamental as the mode of choosing the Chief Executive of the country must have an important bearing on the structure of the Government. If he should be chosen by Congress, as was at first proposed, he would be, logically considered, the creature of Congress, and consistency would seem to require that he should be removable at the will of his creator, as in the case of a British Prime Minister or of the French President under the present working of republican institutions in France. If he is to be elected by the people, he may be chosen in three typical ways—by the people voting en masse, by the people voting as States, or, at one remove from either of these processes, by the people voting for electors. This plan, in any of its forms, has for its effect to vindicate the independence of the Executive as a co-ordinate department of the Government, and to this extent determines a peculiarity of our federative system, as contradistinguished from the centralized system of France. We shall recur to this topic on another occasion; but what we have said seems the indispensable preliminary of any new discussion in the premises.

AN ELEVATED WORLD'S FAIR.

THE World's Fair Commission began its work with a blunder. There is on the part of the people of New York a fixed and very general determination to keep the Central Park sacred to the uses for which it was made, and to guard its boundaries against encroachments of any sort. The Park is the people's pleasure-ground; it is not the place for the Fair of 1883. By choosing it as the site of the proposed exhibition, the gentlemen conducting that enterprise have put themselves in direct antagonism with public sentiment. More than a million men, women and children have the same interest in keeping the Central Park inviolate that they would have if it belonged to them individually instead of collectively. This feeling has already declared itself in ways that are not to be mistaken.

If the Commissioners are wise, they will acknowledge their mistake while it is not too late to withdraw gracefully from a false position. Perhaps they are hasty in assuming that there is no other site available on the island; let them look elsewhere. If anybody's rights are to be invaded in order to make a successful show three years hence, the sufferers should not be the great mass of working New Yorkers who enjoy every square yard of green grass within the present limits of the Park, and who need every cubic inch of fresh air that the beautiful breathing-place now affords.

Has it occurred to the World's Fair Commission that just south of the Central Park there is a plot of land most eligibly situated and amply large for their purposes? We refer to that part of the city which is bounded by Fifty-ninth Street on the north, Fourth and Eighth Avenues on the east and west, and Thirty-ninth Street on the south. Here is a territory, about five hundred acres in extent, comprising the highest and healthiest portion of the town, centrally located, quickly accessible from every point of the compass. If the Fair were established here, there would be no trouble about means of transportation to and from the grounds. The legitimate increase of present facilities would easily accommodate half a million visitors a day.

We respectfully call the attention of the Fair Commission and of the general public to the advantages offered by this site—advantages so numerous and so obvious that there is no need to catalogue them. It is precisely the site which any sagacious committee would select, provided the ground were clear and title to be acquired. That the land is not clear but is pretty solidly built over, and that it is occupied for the most part by the private residences of the wealthiest citizens of New York, are facts of which we are not ignorant. Nor should we for a moment advocate any plan looking to the demolition of these blocks of handsome brown stone and brick dwellings, or to the forcible appropriation of the lots upon which they stand. As it happens, no such extreme measures are necessary. The common law concerning public infringements on private interests has been revolutionized in this city within a few years past, and the enterprising and audacious operations of the rapid transit companies furnish the Fair Commissioners at the same time with a suggestion and a precedent.

Suppose, then, that the promoters of the World's Fair of 1883, instead of seizing upon the ground between Thirty-ninth and Fifty-ninth Streets and the Fourth and Eighth Avenues—which would be sheer robbery—go to work in a lawful and business-like manner and procure the legislation needed to enable them to erect upon iron pillars over that part of New York a second-story structure upon which to hold their Fair. The elevated railroads at Eighth Avenue and One Hundred and Tenth Street, and in Second Avenue above Thirty-fourth Street show what energy and boldness can accomplish in the way of light yet lofty engineering. Strong, graceful columns supporting girders of sufficient resistance, trestlework that shall be an architectural ornament to the neighborhood, and a substantial flooring of hard pine planks painted sky-blue on the under side—what taxpayer living beneath it could reasonably complain? The blue sky can be renewed as often as it gets dingy, and it can be raised high enough above the street-level to preserve the illusion of real heavens, and at the same time clear the chimneys of the tallest mansion on Murray Hill. As for the church-steeples, holes could be left for them; they would still tower above the Fair buildings and lend a unique aspect to the scene of the exhibition. At convenient points stairways or hydraulic elevators will give access from the streets to the Fair grounds above. With the exception of these approaches, and a slender iron column here and there, the appearance of the streets and avenues will remain unaltered. Affairs will go on below as usual. The traffic of the shops, the duties and pleasures of the homes, will not be interfered with; while overhead, on five hundred acres of unincumbered space, the capitalists who invest in the World's Fair may order matters so as to bring the greatest possible credit to their undertaking and the greatest possible financial benefit to themselves.

So far as we are aware, no International Exhibition has ever been held on the plan here indicated. That fact should not deter bold and skilful projectors. The novelty of the scheme, apart from its other advantages, ought to commend it to American enterprise. No doubt people who have had a surfeit of ordinary exhibitions, like those of London, Paris, Vienna and Philadelphia, would embrace with eagerness the opportunity to witness so novel a spectacle. The last great success of the kind was achieved by Nebuchadnezzar, whose hanging gardens at Babylon attracted the curious from the uttermost parts of the earth, and gave him a reputation for ingenuity and enterprise which centuries have not dimmed. But Nebuchadnezzar, it may be said, was an absolute monarch, to whom the interests and convenience of people whose houses or grounds his gardens overhung were not matters to be taken into consideration. Very true. Ten, or even five, years ago an elevated fair in New York would have been an impossibility on account of the now antiquated prejudice against encroachments on property rights. The more enlightened theory of the present day has swept away the old-fashioned ideas. What objection can be made to this proposal that does not apply with equal force to noble and sightly structures which adorn our highways and delight adjacent property-owners?

Nevertheless, having pointed out the advantages of the scheme, it is proper for us to examine some of the hostile arguments that may be advanced by unreasonable residents of the Nineteenth and Twenty-second Wards.

1. The Elevated Fair would cut off the light from real estate underneath it, darkening the windows of the dwelling-houses subjacent and rendering their apartments dismal. But so do the structures of the elevated railroads obstruct the daylight to which householders used to consider themselves entitled in the days when the just relations between enterprising corporations and private owners of real estate were imperfectly understood.

2. Through leaks in the flooring and over its edges water would drip and pour in rainy weather, to the damage of property and the discomfort of people moving underneath. But so does water drip from the elevated railroads to the discomfort of individuals on the street-level; and not only water, but also machine-oil.

3. The noise and bustle of a busy fair and the incessant tramp of one or two hundred thousand pairs of feet on the hard pine planking would be a serious disturbance, if not an intolerable nuisance, to persons living below. But so is the rattle and roar of trains on the elevated railroads a disturbance and a nuisance that has driven hundreds and thousands of people out of their homes.

4. There would be perpetual danger that some heavy exhibit—some prize ox or steam engine, or mammoth geological specimen—might come crashing through the flooring and the roofs of houses beneath to the peril of citizens' lives. But so is there perpetual danger from the elevated railroads, which send down from time to time deadly missiles varying in size from a screwbolt to a locomotive.

5. The elevated Fair would depreciate the value of the property thus roofed over, scaling down the wealth of owners without yielding any compensating advantage, material or moral. This is the objection which is likely to be urged most persistently. It is natural that it should be urged. Under the old system, the erection of the elevated Fair would have been held to be pillage of the many for the benefit of the few. But, as we have seen, the enterprising audacity of the elevated railroad managers has cleared away the cobwebs that formerly obscured this delicate question of proprietary rights. Look at the experience of the property-owners on Fifty-third Street, between Sixth and Ninth avenues—a thoroughfare ruined for residence by the building of the Metropolitan line. What millionaire, dwelling on or above Murray Hill, would suffer more by being roofed in by the Fair than these private citizens on West Fifty-third Street have suffered from the rapid transit company? Let the new principles be equitably applied to the rich, the poor and the men of moderate means. If one corporation is justified in roofing Chatham Square and the

Digitized by Google

Bowery as far up as Canal Street, another corporation may legitimately proceed to put a roof over the section which contains the residences of the capitalists who draw dividends from Manhattan stock, from Metropolitan stock, from New York stock, and from the stock of the Loan and Construction Company. It happens that a majority of the large owners of the elevated railroad system reside in the quarter which would be affected by the elevated Fair. We do not see how these gentlemen can consistently object to be treated on the principles which they themselves have applied in the cases of other property-owners; and if they do object, we do not see why this objection should be for a moment considered.

6. If the elevated Fair structure were permitted at all, it would be likely to become a permanent institution. Once established in the possession of five hundred acres in the most desirable part of the island, costing them nothing, the proprietors of the Fair would be more than human if they suffered themselves to be dislodged. When the Exposition was over they would, no doubt, sell or rent their space for business purposes, and we should have a second story New York to the infinite disadvantage of occupants of the surface level. Well, suppose this should be the case, would not their title to the five hundred acres be considered an unexceptionable one, by the directors of the elevated railroads, for example, who refuse to be driven out of the Battery Park now that they have obtained a foothold there, and who rent to dealers in books and periodicals the space in their stations which they acquired on the pretext of accommodating the public?

Let us not take a narrow view of this matter. It is undoubtedly an excellent thing to have rapid transit facilities. So it would be an excellent thing to have an Elevated World's Fair, and mere questions of real estate ownership, personal convenience and property rights should not be allowed to stand in the way in one case more than in the other. Here is a great opportunity for bold and sagacious men.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

DULCIGNO has at last been ceded, and so far the Powers have been successful in putting into effect the clauses of the Treaty of Berlin. The Albanians made a firm stand, and only yielded to force of arms. Dervish Pasha, who succeeded Riza Pasha as the Turkish commander, was compelled to advance against the inhabitants of the town and members of the League, who had taken up a strong position in the olive groves which surround the little city. It was only after a brisk skirmish, in which the Turks lost many more men than the Albanians, that the latter thought their honor sufficiently avenged and agreed to evacuate the town. But it was found that the Prince of Montenegro, to whom the territory was to be ceded, was not satisfied, and demanded a formal cession. This was granted, and the Montenegrins now occupy the city.

The question of the scrutin de liste, which has really been the burning question in French politics for the last year, is about to be brought before the Chambers. M. Gambetta has long been deeply interested in this question, and has only been prevented from bringing it forward by the pressure of other important measures. The bill, which is presented by M. Bardoux, provides for an election of Deputies by departments instead of the present system of election by arrondissements. Under the present system of single-membered constituencies it is difficult to avoid official candidature, so that the contest is one rather of persons than of political ideas. It is urged that, by making the voting by departments, small local interests will be merged in the larger questions before the whole people, and that the present nuisance of place-hunters, who think that they have a claim upon their Deputy, and who overwhelm him with demands for offices for themselves and friends, will be got rid of. The diffusion of education is now making it possible for every voter to fill up his own voting paper, and M. Bardoux proposes to make voting compulsory. At least he goes as far as to deprive for a time any person, who has no legitimate excuse for not voting, of his rights, and to placard him at the Mairie. The main object of the scrutin de liste is to effect an equality of electoral power. At present the largest and smallest arrondissements, with a population under 100,000, have each one Deputy indiscriminately. M. Bardoux proposes to give one Deputy for every 70,000 inhabitants, and in order to avoid a too frequent recurrence of the elections, it is suggested that an election should only take place when there are two vacancies to be filled.

The case of General de Cissey is before the tribunals, and is also the subject of an inquiry in the Chamber of Deputies. The Government objected to the proposed inquiry on the ground that, while a judicial investigation was in progress, it was improper to have any political discussion. General de Cissey's action is a suit for 25,000 francs against Henri Rochefort and Deputy Laisant, the editors of the Intransigeant and the Petit Parisien. The evidence for General de Cissey is very strong, and totally dissociates him from any possibility of giving information to Madame de Kaulla in the case of the mitrailleuses and the plan of mobilization, which were the principal charges made against the general by Colonel Jung and Woestyne.

A movement is on foot in Prussia against the Jews, who, it is thought, are acquiring too much wealth and influence. It is well known that Prince Bismarck has never been friendly towards them, and the present agitation is said to be probably approved of by him. In the last session of Parliament, Bismarck's son introduced and succeeded in passing an Act against usury, which was really an anti-Jewish measure. The feeling of the Court is scarcely known as yet, but it is more than probable that the Emperor is adverse to the Jews. He is said to have requested that the views of the foreign press upon the question should be laid before him, and one of the Emperor's chaplains, the Rev. Mr. Stöcker, has for some time been a leader in the crusade against the Hebrews.

Political affairs are very quiet in England, and it is almost certain that Parliament will not meet until January. This means that the counsels of the Radical portion of the Cabinet have prevailed, and that no coercive Act will be enacted for Ireland until some measures to alleviate the alleged wrongs in the system of land tenure have been introduced. When Parliament does meet, the action of the Government will undoubtedly be the subject of much harsh criticism. The condition of Ireland is most unsatisfactory, and apparently grows worse every day. Tenants refuse to pay their rents or to give up their holdings. No landlord's life is safe. Even persons who take farms from which the former tenant was evicted are threatened with death and murdered. Many persons who have made themselves obnoxious to the Land Leaguers by insisting upon their undoubted rights are "Boycotted," or prevented from gathering their crops by the discontents. Respectable tradesmen who have refused to subscribe to the funds of the Leaguers, or have otherwise offended, are put upon the black lists, and the peasantry are forbidden to deal with them. Every kind of aggression is practiced, and still the Government does not resort to the means which lie within its reach for putting an end to this state of anarchy. It would have a better excuse for not taking active measures, if it were likely that the Land Leaguers would be satisfied by the introduction of some reforms in the land tenure; but it is evident, from the recent speeches of the agitators, that they will not be satisfied with less than a confiscation of the soil and a separation of Ireland from Great Britain. Of course it is ridiculous to suppose for a moment that an English Parliament would ever listen to such a dismemberment of the empire, and hence it seems to many people that the English Government would act more kindly towards the Irish people by nipping in the bud any revolutionary movements like that which is at present disturbing the peace of Ireland. Meanwhile, the prosecutions against the leaders of the land movement are going on, and the latest development is an application made by the defendants for an attachment against a Dublin evening newspaper, which has denounced the Land Leaguers in somewhat strong terms.

THERE is a possibility that General Ben Harrison will be elected as United States Senator from Indiana. The State could not make a better selection. General Harrison represents the best element of the Republican party, and would bring to the public service high ability joined to sturdy independence and integrity of purpose—qualities which are as sorely needed in the Senate as in other branches of that service.

THE annual report of the Treasurer of the United States shows that of the $72,847,750 of standard silver dollars coined under the Act of 1878, just about two-thirds, or $47,588,106 are still in the Treasury. This does not look as if the public were as eager for "the dollar of the daddies" as the silver advocates have represented them to be. The Treasurer hints that the withdrawal of the trade dollar from circulation is perhaps the only method by which the standard silver dollars can be brought into general demand.

THE traffic of the canals of this State for 1880 shows a large increase over previous years. The increase in tolls up to November 15th, over last year, was $131,790, in tons 888,949, and in miles traveled 1,374,980, while the increase in tons over 1876 was 2,079,250. One main cause of this great increase in traffic was the rapid transit afforded by the cable system of towing which has been in operation between Buffalo and Rochester during the season. The early completion of this system of steam towage is urged by the State Superintendent as necessary to the largest possible usefulness of the canals.

THE Metropolitan Museum of Art has received from Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, one of its trustees, a substantial addition to its treasures in the form of a collection of original drawings by the most eminent Italian, French, Spanish, German, Dutch and Flemish masters. This collection was begun in the last century, and since been increased by a number of collectors. The London Academy pronounces it, on the authority of good critics, one of the best ever gathered in Italy. No collection in any way comparable to this in scope or extent has ever been seen in this country. The number of drawings is 690.

AMONG the gentlemen named as the successor of United States Senator Kernan from this State is Hon. Levi P. Morton, now a member of the House, in which he has acquired a leading position. If the solid financial and business interests of the Empire State need a representative in the Senate, then Mr. Morton is just the man for the place. If a Senator is to be chosen as the representative merely of the political class, without regard to his practical qualifications, then Mr. Morton can have little hope of success. Our own belief is that this State should have in the Senate at least one man of just Mr. Morton's sound business capacity, who understands fully all our financial, commercial and industrial interests, and whose intelligence and experience would afford a reasonable protection against prejudicial legislation in any direction whatever.

MR. PARNELL has issued another appeal to the American people, hoping all lovers of freedom will assist the agitation now going on in Ireland which will secure a radical settlement of the land question. Mr. Parnell may as well dismiss all hope of any substantial aid from this country in support of his schemes. It is the veriest folly for him to indulge in such expectations, and he simply insults and misleads his hearers when he uses such language as this, which we quote from one of his recent speeches: "I feel convinced that if you ever call upon the Americans in another field and in another way for help, and if you can show them that there is a fair and good chance of success, you will have their assistance, their trained and organized assistance, for the purpose of breaking the yoke which encircles you." Somebody should supply the arch agitator with a strait-jacket.

A SYNDICATE of American and European bankers has just concluded an agreement with the Northern Pacific Railway Company to furnish the sum of $40,000,000 for the completion of that road, and the more sanguine directors expect to see the whole length of the proposed line in operation within three years. The rails were laid across the Montana boundary, one hundred and seventy-seven miles west of the Missouri River early in November; now the grade is completed to the Yellowstone, and the rails will be laid to that point within a few days. There is now in all only about eight hundred miles of road remaining to be built. About three hundred miles of this will be constructed during the coming year. Rails will be shipped around the Horn, to be laid on the western end of the road, at the same time that the graders push the work in Montana. The completion of this great enterprise will open a vast territory of wonderful richness, and thus contribute enormously to the national wealth.

THE Virginia organ of General Mahone defines the political position of that gentleman at some length and with rather startling emphasis. It declares that, while General Mahone is a Democrat, he is "not a broker's man, or a Bourbon, or a mere counter to be used in games to be played by other men. He will be no puppet anywhere to be moved hither and thither by the wireworkers." The writer adds:

"In a Senate controlled by the same influences which have so signally set him apart as the apostle of the new and liberalized political dispensation in the South, General Mahone will inevitably seek to divest the Southern and National Democracy of their dead and decaying moss-covered boughs, and stimulate a fresh development more in accordance with the times and the necessities of the situation. He will try to give Democracy a face less repulsive than that it now wears, and endeavor to so ameliorate Southern politics that they will not be a standing menace against immigration nor a threat to reopen all the questions that have already been determined by the stern arbitrament of the sword."

This is certainly clear and explicit, and it will be a fortunate thing for Virginia and the South if this able leader shall succeed in accomplishing the results at which he seems to aim.

THE report of the Children's Aid Society, presented at its annual meeting last week, affords a most gratifying exhibit of the great results achieved by that organization during the last twenty-seven years. The Society now has twenty-one industrial schools and six lodging-houses under its control, and reaches some 20,000 poor or homeless children every year, while over 9,000 orphans come under its immediate influence. It has found homes for over 50,000 children in the West and other portions of the country. Then it has ten night schools, influencing hundreds of street children; the Summer home, sheltering its 3,000 children; the sick mission, tending its 3,000 and more cases; and the reading-rooms, providing a place of virtuous resort for several hundreds. To this will be added during next Summer a sanitarium on the sea-coast for sick children. Since the organization of the Society, some 200,000 different boys and girls have been sheltered and partly fed and instructed in its lodging-houses. In the industrial schools probably over 100,000 poor little girls have been taught, and of these it is not known that even twenty have entered on criminal courses of life; and all this great work has been accomplished at comparatively trifling expense. The report says:

"The total annual expense of our twenty-one industrial schools for salaries, rents, food, clothing, books, etc., last year, was $73,464.86, which sum, divided by 3,861—the average number in daily attendance—would make $20.63 the annual cost for each child. The cost in 1878 for each child in our public schools, not including rents, was $38.41—this expense, of course, not including food or clothing. In our lodging-houses 13,463 boys and girls were fed, sheltered and taught during the last year, at a total expense of $47,216.81. Deducting the receipts, together with the cost of construction—$27,112.97—the net cost was $20,709.84; dividing this by the nightly average attendance, we have the average cost to the public of each child for the year $46.50. The average cost per year of each prisoner in the Tombs is $197.75; and the Roman Catholic Protectory draws from the city treasury over $100 annually for each of its inmates. The total number placed out by the society, mainly in Western homes, last year was 3,764; the total cost for railroad fares, clothing, food, salaries, etc., was $32,146.95; the average cost to the public, accordingly, for each person was $8.54. Yet any one of these children placed in an asylum or poorhouse for a year would have cost undoubtedly nearly $140.

The statistics here given speak for themselves. They can scarcely fail to command for this worthy charity the enlarged contributions which its rapidly increasing work and broadening opportunities make plainly necessary.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

GENERAL SCHOFIELD will be relieved from command at West Point.

A DETERMINED fight against the gamblers has been inaugurated at Washington.

THE Mississippi is frozen over at Muscatine, Iowa, the earliest for thirty-eight years.

THE estimated expenses of carrying on the Government for the year amount to $298,202,122.

OVER 7,000,000 bushels of grain were frozen up on the Erie Canal during the cold snap of last week.

SNOW storms prevailed in many Northern cities on Thanksgiving Day, extending as far West as Chicago, and as far East as New York.

AN American was shot by a Mexican in Brackett, Texas, last week, and a riot followed in which three Mexican houses were destroyed.

COMPTROLLER KNOX, in his annual report, recommends legislation to protect the national banks from oppressive taxation by the States.

THE South Carolina Legislature met and organized November 23d. The inauguration of the new Governor and Lieutenant-Governor took place on the 30th.

SIX persons have died and thirty are dangerously ill from the effects of arsenic mistakenly used for salt in preparation of food for a wedding feast at Kingston, Tennessee.

THE American schooner Mary E. Hall was overhauled off the coast of Peru on the 8th by a Chilian cruiser, whose commander subsequently apologized for the outrage.

TWENTY-ONE intruders in the Indian Territory have been arrested in the Oklahoma country. Troops have been sent from Fort Leavenworth to establish a camp in the district.

TWO treaties, one of commerce and one of immigration, were signed between China and the United States at Pekin on the 17th instant, by which this country will control Chinese immigration.

THE Fall River (Mass.) manufacturers having refused to treat with their employés in reference to a restoration of wages to the figure paid before April last, the weavers are preparing for a strike.

THE loss of life among the fishermen of Gloucester, Mass., for the year, has been forty-one, which is two more than in 1877, and six more than in 1878, but smaller than for any other year since 1866.

THE decline of our carrying trade is shown by a decrease of 101,566 tons in the total tonnage of last year. During the year the amount of ship-building has been less by 35,620 tons than that of the preceding year.

OWING to a water famine, many iron mills and other industrial establishments in Eastern Pennsylvania are closed. Farmers are driving stock for miles to water, and water for household needs is hauled in barrels.

GENERAL GARFIELD visited Washington last week to look after private business demanding his attention. At his own request, no public demonstration was made on his arrival or during his sojourn in the city.

THE estimates for river and harbor improvements, which will be sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, will contain an item of $300,000 for the continuance of the work in the East River and at Hell Gate.

THE city police have renewed their campaign against dealers in lottery and policy tickets, several of whom have been arrested and held for trial. Governor Cornell is credited with the instigation of this very proper movement.

TWENTY-TWO vessels are known to have been wrecked on the coast of Newfoundland during the gale of last week. Between twenty and thirty vessels left for northern ports shortly before the gale, and it is feared that many of them were lost with all hands on board.

IN reply to a letter from the Independent Republican Association of New York on civil service reform, President-elect Garfield says he hopes to have the co-operation of Congress in establishing a legal basis for routine appointments, so that no one can remove a faithful appointee.

SIXTY laborers were buried in a snow-slide last Friday near Chalk Creek, Colorado, on the Kokomo extension of the Denver and Rio Grande Road. The slide tore up the track for a distance of a quarter of a mile. One man was killed, nineteen men were badly injured, and eleven others slightly.

COMMISSIONER SHUFELDT, in his report on his mission to Corea, says that the Coreans prefer American goods to English and French, and are willing to negotiate a commercial treaty with the United States, but that the presence of the squadrons of the two Powers prevented the conclusion of such a treaty.

THE amount of national bank notes outstanding on November 1st was $342,803,451, and of legal-tender notes $346,681,016. The aggregate amount of both kinds of notes in 1879 was $681,815,520, and in 1878 $666,233,127. The national banks now hold nearly one-tenth of the interest bearing debt of the United States. The total number of national banks, State banks, savings banks, private bankers, etc., in the country on June 11th, 1880, was 6,632, with a total banking capital of $680,949,290 and total deposits of $2,219,883,299.

HON. WILLIAM D. KELLEY.

THE "Father" of the House of Representatives is Judge Kelley, of Pennsylvania, who is the oldest of all the members of the new Congress in congressional service, and the only member who has continued in that body for twenty consecutive years. There are but two whose elections antedate him. Fernando Wood was in Congress before Judge Kelley's first election, as was S. S. Cox, then a member from Ohio, but both retired for some years before they commenced their present term, and neither has served as many years as Kelley. He is, therefore, the veteran of the body, and his abilities and active participation in the discussion of all important public questions entitle him to the highest honors his party can confer upon him.

William D. Kelley is a native of Philadelphia, and was 66 years old last April. He received a thorough English education, and became by profession a lawyer. He served two terms as Prosecuting-Attorney for the City and County of Philadelphia, and for ten years was Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. He entered upon his Congressional service with the Thirty-seventh Session, and has been his own successor in every following one, scoring a majority at the last election of 9,770 in a spirited contest.

His public career is familiar. He has been trusted; he has been consistent. The Philadelphia Times, in speaking of him in connection with the coming session, says:

"The late Presidential contest was most successfully fought out on the issue of Protection. It was the Tariff that swelled Ohio, that aided most in the Indiana revolution, that piled up 35,000 majority in Pennsylvania, that took Connecticut out of the list of doubtful Republican States, and that made New Jersey tremble in the balance. Of that now most prominent issue, Judge Kelley is the foremost representative, not only in Pennsylvania, but the foremost of all the members of the popular branch of Congress, and his election to the Speakership would do more for the cause of Protection than any other organization that could possibly be effected.

"The great battle for the maintenance of Protection must be fought in the next Congress, and the issue will be decided for years to come. Hitherto Judge Kelley's pronounced support of Protection has hindered his just promotion, and it will be so again unless the Republicans who so fervently fought the Tariff issue before the people now fight it with equal vigor through their Representatives.

"Judge Kelley is fairly entitled to the generous support of his Republican associates from Pennsylvania for the Speakership, and a solid and vigorous concentration of the Protectionists in his support would secure the possession of the Republican organization by the Tariff men, and that would settle the question. It is probable that Judge Kelley has little taste or ambition for the Speakership, but the great interest his State has in the solution of the Tariff problem, should make her voice a unit in favor of his election to the chair."

HON. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, "FATHER" OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FATAL COAL MINE EXPLOSION IN NOVA SCOTIA.

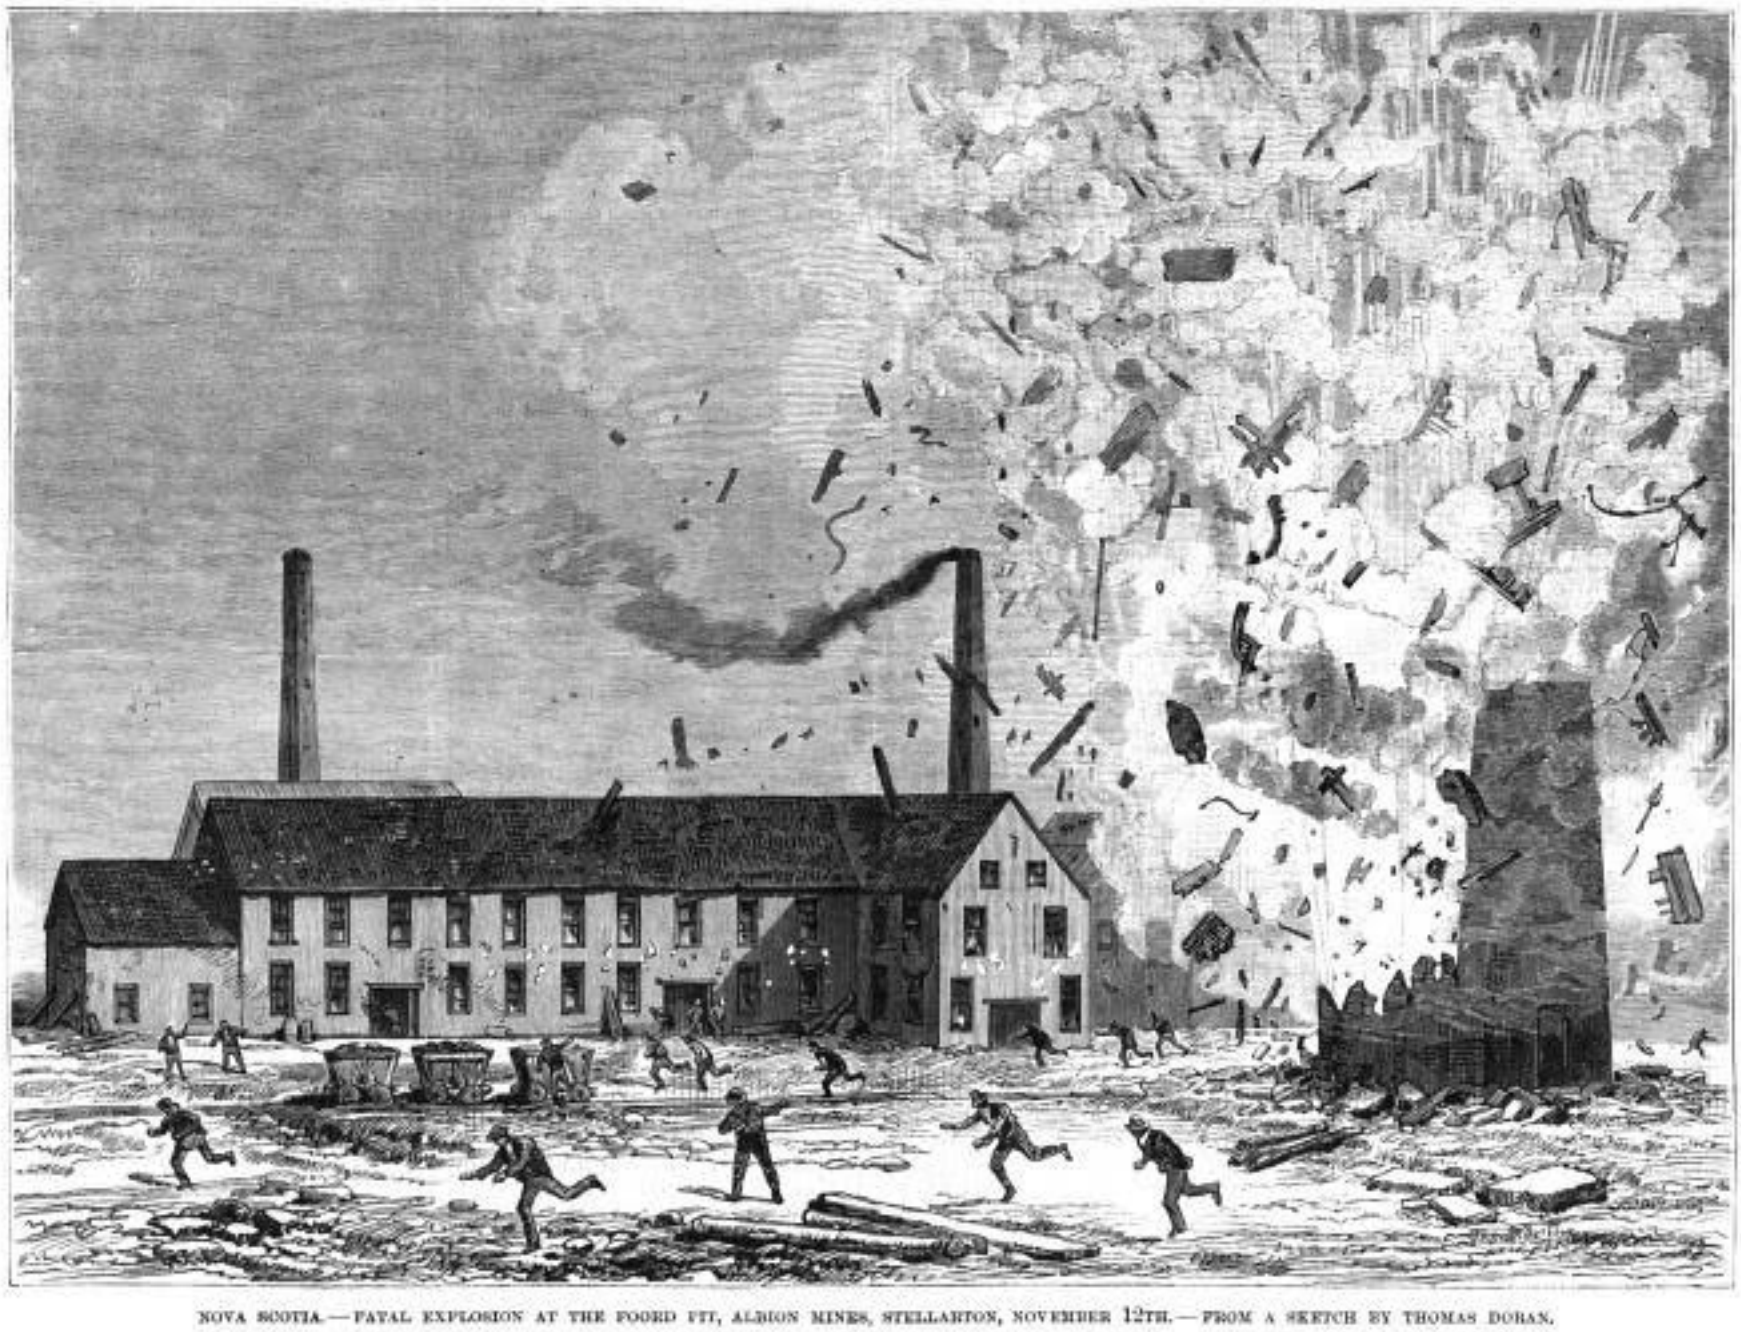
AN explosion of gas occurred in the Foord Pit, Albion Mines, at Stellarton, Nova Scotia, on Friday morning, November 12th, by which many lives were lost and much valuable property destroyed. At the time of the accident there were forty-seven men and boys in the mine; of the former, thirty-three were married. Searching parties were at once organized, miners volunteering from all the collieries in the country, and as soon as it was deemed safe, the Government Inspector of Mines, the local manager, and a gang of men, went down the shaft of the pit and made a short exploration. They found the bodies of three men and a number of dead horses. Two of the dead men were immediately taken to the surface, but the third was so tightly jammed into a heap of fallen timber and rubbish that the attempt to extricate it would only have been incurring danger uselessly, as the rubbish would certainly have fallen on any one touching it. The choke-damp was still too thick to allow the party to carry their explorations very far, but in one of the boards or straits from the main railway a faint smell of smoke and a slightly warmer atmosphere could be detected, which showed that it was not improbable that fire still remained in the mine.

On the following day a second party went down, and were able to go further into the galleries than the first. The man who, the night before, thought he detected signs of fire, again investigated the same place, and going further into the passage, soon found unmistakable indications that he was right. A little further on a brick stopping, closing another unused passage, was found, and here dense black smoke was pouring out with a roar like escaping steam. The two men at once ran back to the rest of the party, and as they were now in the greatest danger they rapidly got back to the pit bottom and ascended to the surface.

The local managers, the Government Inspector and several of the overmen and old miners were called to a meeting, at which it was decided to flood the portion of the mine where the fire seemed to proceed from, as, if prompt means were not taken, further explosions were not unlikely at any moment, with consequences which might be serious even on the surface.

When the work of flooding the mine had been gone on with for some time, and no further explosions occurred, the danger was supposed to be over. More especially was this believed, as there was no sign of smoke from the fan-shaft nor from any of the others. It was supposed that if the fire in the mine had not been kept back by the rising water, smoke must have issued from the fan-shaft at least. Consequently a feeling of security began to prevail; but about 10 o'clock on Saturday night the people were startled by another frightful explosion.

The first two explosions, on Friday morning, had been noiseless, and, with the exception of knocking off the top of the fan-shaft, had done no damage on the surface. But this explosion came with a mighty roar, a report which was heard for miles, and shook the ground like an earthquake. It came up the fan shaft, blowing the roof off the building, and the gear of the shaft, timbers, bricks and rubbish, high into the air. Several large buildings, including the carpenters' shops and boiler-house, were close by this shaft, and the descending débris riddled the roofs, some of the holes being of immense size.



From all over the country where the explosion was heard people came pouring in, and the utmost excitement existed in the village close by. The scared miners and women and children, half-dressed, ran from their shanties, and soon the crowd numbered hundreds. Every moment during the night another explosion was expected; but, though a large volume of dark smoke was issuing from the fan-shaft, nothing further occurred, and as the gray light of morning began to appear, many people retired again to their shanties, but not to sleep. The feeling of the hundreds of families who saw the means of existence swept from them was one of blank despair.

These explosions were followed by others throughout Saturday and Sunday, which placed the entire mine and all the property in the neighborhood in imminent peril. Steam fire-engines were sent thither from contiguous towns, and every effort was made to get the galleries and pits thoroughly flooded with water.

At last accounts the bodies of the victims had not been recovered. Great distress prevails in Stellarton, and measures of relief had to be undertaken at once.

GENERAL GARFIELD AT A TEA-PARTY.

GENERAL GARFIELD has had a busy time of it since his election as President. Scarcely a day has passed that he has not been invaded by delegations of friends, or called upon to participate in some social or other festivity. On the 19th ultimo, he was the guest of Lake Erie Seminary, at Painesville, Ohio, where a tea-party was given in honor of the eve of his 49th birthday. The seminary has 124 young ladies as pupils, all of whom seem so have entered into the spirit of the occasion with the utmost enthusiasm. The rooms of the institution were finely decorated; the chapel was transformed for the evening into a parlor, and flowers and other æsthetic attractions were displayed in profusion on every side. Over the chapel-platform hung a handsome portrait of General Garfield under a new flag which has recently been presented to the seminary

Immediately over the picture was the date of the General's birth, November 19th, 1831. At the right of the picture the date of his marriage, November 11th, 1858, with the motto:

"Two heads in council,
Two heads beside the hearth."

At the left of the picture was the date of the election, with the motto: "Be strong and of a good courage."

On the south wall of the chapel was a handsome picture of Garfield, framed in natural flowers, sent by Hon. C. A. Avery, one of the trustees. In the hallway at the east entrance was the legend: "Honor to the teacher, Hiram; to the soldier, Chickamauga; to the statesman, 1859-1880." Over the main entrance was draped a flag, made peculiarly interesting from the fact that it was made and presented to the seminary by some of the students during the war. Through neglect it has become worn and old, but it is no less a precious relic of those stormy times almost at the birth of the institution.

General Garfield, with his wife and three children, reached the seminary in the early evening, and soon after the party proceeded to the supper-room, which was also decorated, the motto, "Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness," being conspicuous. After tea the young ladies conducted their guests to the chapel, where an informal programme of exercises contributed to the enjoyment of all present. The company of young ladies gave a pretty exhibition of gymnastic proficiency, followed by an exercise called the fan-drill, suggested by one of Addison's "Spectators." This is illustrated on page 237.

General Garfield seemed to enjoy the occasion greatly, entering heartily into its spirit, his manner being characterized by the simplicity which always marks it while in public and in private. Among the persons in attendance were Daniel P. Eells, of Cleveland; Professor N. P. Seymour and wife, of Western Reserve College; Mr. Fitch, of Ashtabula; McCormick, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, a special artist of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER; L. A. Porter and wife, Hon. T. W. Harvey and wife, Rev. George R. Merrill and wife, Rev. J. A. Cory, Rev. Alanson Phelps and wife, Judge Reuben Hitchcock, the Misses Wilcox, and a few others from Painesville, all connected with the Seminary. No general invitations were issued, the reception so-called being in the full sense "a family tea-party."

GLITZ.

I HAD been reading "Barnaby Rudge," and, in a fit of speculation, embracing that feature of the book which brings into consideration that subtle back-turning of the mind to scenes and events that have brought to its possessor calamity and suffering, and which constitutes the strongest form of fascination known to psychology, I wandered absently out of my apartment, and, arriving at the door of my hotel, saw Glitz shuffling along the sidewalk and peering hungrily in at the dining-room windows.

Glitz had formerly been a waiter in the establishment, and during my Summer absence, I found, upon inquiry, had been dismissed for excessive tippling; but I had conceived a liking for the old fellow during a long course of faithful service, and it occurred to me to bring him along with me to my room and hear the story of his misfortune from his own lips.

It was too evident that the poor old boy had fared hardly since his dismissal, although his threadbare garments were brushed with a reckless disregard for their frailty, and there was still that scrupulous nicety about his linen that had made him peculiarly acceptable about one's table. Still, he was deplorably seedy, and I noticed that his hands shook and his eyes were watery and wandered as he followed me up the stairs.

Dickens was doubtless accountable for the idiosyncrasy, but, as I motioned my convoy to a seat by the fire and leisurely relapsed into my own comfortable easy-chair, the impression took hold upon me that something besides a love of spirits had contributed to bring Glitz to his present unhappy condition, particularly as, on reflection, I brought to mind the years of sobriety and thrift through which I had known him.

Why, being, as many besides myself could attest, a capable and discreet waiter, had he not sought and obtained another situation, instead of constantly returning to haunt the scene of his former labors in an idleness foreign to his training and habit?

Destitution is never the choice of a naturally frugal man, such as this one had always appeared to be, and I now remembered to have been told that he had daily been seen in the vicinity of the house since the time of his dismissal, arguing that he had made little or no effort to get employment elsewhere.

On the strength of these cogitations I opened my inquiry, and immediately saw that I had struck the keynote of his distemper, since, drawing himself together with a shiver, and glancing fearfully over his shoulder in the direction of the door, as if apprehending some intrusive and dangerous witness to what he was about to disclose, the old man answered:

"Monsieur is in the right; it is not the drink that has brought old Glitz to the trottoir—it is one ideah—one fancy most horrible, that only the absinthe gives to him the courage to support!"

Few people are superior to the throb of gratified vanity incident to finding one's convictions borne out by the elucidation of facts. My interest was now fully awakened, and, with a little encouragement both with words and from a cut-glass decanter always kept within convenient reach in case of emergencies, I brought my visitor's courage up to the point of telling his story, which, owing to a difficulty I experience in phoneticising, I am reduced to giving, divested of the charm of his quaint Swiss idiom and pronunciation:

"It was some time before monsieur went away to his sojourn by the sea, and on a stormy Sunday evening, that I received an order for a dinner to be served, en tête-à-tête, in No. 8, just across the corridor from the door of m'sieu's own apartment.

"It was a very pretty little dinner, and feeling myself confident of a fine pourboire, I made myself the assurance that it should be handsomely served.

"On presenting myself to lay the cloth, I found within the salon a gentleman, très distingué in his appearance, but with a hard frown upon his face of which I could not approve, since his companion was a lady, charmingly petite, who seemed to see the sun, moon and stars all shining magnificently around his unappreciative head.

"At a glance I became aware that here was some grand unhappiness, and that the little lady had somehow to contend with the gentleman's obstinate will, for which I was extremely sorry, having had all my life the greatest sympathy with le beau sexe, which has become my ruin, helas!

"The garçon who has pride in his profession has always to feel himself afflicted when, having served a dinner of merit, he has to remove plat after plat untasted; but, so strongly was the sentimental part of my nature engaged on this occasion that this gross injustice failed to produce the least mortification, and I found myself watching the mignonne face of the lady with the most painful anxiety, since the time was approaching when I must quit the apartment, and her companion, whose face had grown moment by moment more hard and frowning, had already drank more wine than is good for the discretion of a man who does not eat at the same time.

"I quite brought myself to a condition of terror on madame's account, and indeed there was a tear sparkling in her beautiful black eyes when it at last occurred that I could no longer make pretext for lingering in the salon, and in spite of the gentleman's most forbidding air I said, upon retiring:

"'I shall have pleasure to answer the bell immediately, should my further attendance be desired.'

"However, and although I remained in the corridor during every available moment of the evening, there came no summons to re-enter the apartment, and indeed I found myself in no further connection with No. 8 until a week later, when again I was instructed to serve dinner in the salon, and, from the wines ordered, made myself certain that it was the same party whom I should serve.

"Very good! My impressions had not contributed to my disappointment. On going in to prepare the table it was to the same little, dark lady, and to the same colossal blonde gentleman that I paid my devoir—quite the same both, and yet at once I told myself that madame was not so small nor m'sieur so large as at first they had appeared to me.

"Again the dinner was most beautiful—m'sieur had certainly received an education most excellent—but again the most artistic creations were suffered to be removed comparatively untouched, although, much to my bewilderment, it transpired that such food as was taken was consumed by m'sieur, and that it was the glass of madame that most frequently required to be filled.

"Nevertheless, and notwithstanding the change, that, by long experience in the observation of the countenance, which is one of the most important branches of my profession, I was enabled to discover to have taken place in the mood of the little lady, 'It still was but a canary-bird in the talons of the vulture.' I reflected, and upon retiring again said, but addressing myself to m'sieur, although my attention was solely directed to madame:

"'I shall be within sound of the bell should m'sieur require anything further.'

"Still, as before, the bell did not ring—there was no additional service required in the salon of No. 8—and again my mysterious couple disappeared, and, but for the pourboire in my pocket, I might easily have imagined myself the victim of an illusion, since neither coming nor going had I seen the people whom I always found sitting opposite each other at the table; there was never anything to indicate that the apartment was to be, or had been, occupied, either before or after the dinner was served, nor, beyond the order which was given me to be filled, did I ever hear the slightest reference made to these guests by any one in the hotel.

"Quite unconsciously I had come to entertain a feeling of superstition in regard to the pair, and, after waiting in much suspense for the expected order on the following Sunday evening until long past the usual hour for its appearance, I could not resist the impulse to make my way to the room and discover if the small, dark lady and tall, blonde man were not in their accustomed places, and the usual dinner either serving itself or being served by another attendant.

"All was dark and silent within the salon. M'sieur and madame were taking their Sunday dinner elsewhere; some fortunate garçon was doubtless at this moment feeling my pourboire warm within his pocket.

"The next and still the next Sunday I continued to cherish expectations that I should again receive the order for the same recherché dinner that I had twice already served, and even betrayed myself into the folly of preparing the glasses and the cooler for the particular wine m'sieur enjoyed and of which madame had deigned freely to drink; but they came not, and in the depth of my chagrin, when the fourth Sunday night came round I resolved within myself to divest me of a chimera thing less significant than the serving of your own bachelor dinner, monsieur, in a style to command your supremest satisfaction, when, all at once, it occurred to me that you were absent, and at that moment an order for No. 8, but for only one plate, was placed in my hand.

"In the confusion and bewilderment which my emotion at this unprecedented event occasioned me, I started to cross the grand dining salon instead of going by the corridor to obtain the necessary linen, and, scarcely had my foot passed over the threshold when I became glued to the spot whereon I stood by a second and greater shock.

"There, directly before my eyes, sat the small, dark lady at a table spread for three, and beside her was a child about six years of age—a boy, large and most admirable in form, with waving blonde hair, and blue imperious eyes—while upon the other side of madame there was a gentleman, only a little less dark than herself, of a medium size and with a face to inspire one with instant confidence and a disposition to turn towards him the integrity of one's character.

"There were no tears in madame's beautiful eyes to-night, and yet I caught myself wishing that she would smile less often, when the child, with cries of 'Papa' and 'Mamma,' pierced through the coma that had befallen me, and brought me to hasten to the service required of me in No. 8.

"It was with no surprise that I found the tall, blonde gentleman awaiting me in the small salon. That he was impatient and swore a little at my trifling seemed to me not unnatural, and, although I waited upon him with all dispatch, I contrived, in passing to and from the ordinaire, to inform myself that the little lady and her escort were in full dinner toilet, showing that they were for the time at least in residence within the hotel.

"The tall gentleman sat much longer than heretofore at table, eating and drinking with a fierce appetite that was not at all agreeable to behold, and, contrary to habit, I withdrew at last, having opened a fresh bottle of fiery red wine, and placed a fresh glass upon the table, after removing the cloth.

"Mindful of my pourboire and of my discretion at once, I made my usual little proffer of additional attendance upon retiring, but scarcely had I made myself acquainted with the suite of apartments in which the little lady and her party were lodged and returned to my watch, when the bell of No. 8 rang furiously.

"It surely could not be more wine that was wanted so soon, I thought, as I hastened up the stairway, and a seriousness not unwarranted by what followed prevaded my being as I entered the salon.

"The large gentleman still sat at the table where I had left him, but, instead of the wine-glass which I had anticipated to see in his hand, there was a slip of white paper, folded and twisted, that he at first held out to me, and then partially withdrew, saying:

"'You seem a sensible and discreet fellow, and should have sufficient address to do me a service cleverly. Find in what part of the hotel the lady whom you have seen with me here is located, learn when she is alone, and then deliver me this billet to her.'

"I bowed without speaking, since most incomprehensibly I discovered myself to be laboring under no inconsiderable agitation; but to obey was my habit, and, receiving the bit of paper, I departed in pursuit of the errand.

"Fortune favored me, since I had not been in the vicinity of madame's door many minutes when it was opened by the gentleman with whom I had seen her at the table, who turned back when on the threshold to kiss the little lad, running after him in its long white night-robe; then placing the child in the arms of his nurse and calling out in a cheerful, pleasant voice to some one whom I could not see, but assumed to be the little lady, that he would return in an hour or two, closed the door and went away towards the great hall into which I watched him disappear.

"Waiting until I could determine, by the disposition of the lights and the murmur of voices that the maid was hushing the child to sleep in the inner room, I tapped gently, and with an intimation of privacy, upon the door.

"It was madame herself who opened to me, and there was a startled flush mounting under the dark skin that receded, leaving her face in dusky pallor, which illumined it like the rays of a white, cold moon, as she took the paper and read the few words written in pencil thereon.

"It was, perhaps, a singular coincidence that she should have so repeated the tall gentleman's words in addressing me, but I did not think of it at the time, being only conscious of the devotion that had grown unnoticed in my breast, and now received its quickening impulse.

"'You seem a faithful, discreet person, and should be able to arrange that I meet no embarrassments in leaving or returning to my room. Say that I will come immediately!'

"I bowed and retired, still singularly disturbed, considering that a waiter's life necessarily embraces many little episodes which he must not undertake to explain, and when I had delivered her message to the blonde gentleman, whose frowning, harsh countenance still further disquieted me, I proceeded to station myself in the corridor in a position to justify the confidence reposed in me, and of which I appreciated the importance.

"In a very short time I caught the frou-frou of madame's train along the carpet, and as she passed me every detail of her beautiful appearance penetrated me with a fascination impelling me, beyond my powers of resistance, to follow her footsteps.

"No. 8, as monsieur will remember, has a little vestibule of its own, and, as I noiselessly withdrew myself into its shadow, I discovered that the little lady had left the door of the salon ajar, permitting me both to see and to hear what was passing within.

"So great was my confusion, however, that I did not, for a short time, gather anything intelligible of what was passing, and when my agitation in a measure subsided the little madame was saying, her voice wondrously full of passion:

"'Have you no feeling for the good man whom we have basely betrayed—no mercy for the child whose life must be overshadowed by this act of madness?'

"'The child is mine—you are mine—and I have been too long defrauded of my rights. It is his turn to suffer as I have suffered, and, ours being the sin, it is but justice to undeceive him rather than to basely rob him of that affection which nature teaches the father's heart. As for the boy, mine be it to guard his future, and the sooner the task is begun the more surely it may be accomplished,' answered her companion, in tones, the cold, cruel intensity of which caused even me, who was not then vitally concerned, to shiver with their chill.

"'Mercy, Jerome!—have mercy on me! Is my ruin which you plan so remorselessly!' pleaded the little lady.

"'Had you any mercy upon me when you beguiled me into a love that you knew must for ever make me an outcast from every sweet domestic joy!' exclaimed the man, fiercely. 'You plead in vain. Give me my boy. You may arrange it how you will—to come with me, or, by some ingenious lie, to cover your sin and remain with the man whom you have successfully duped through all these years, but the child I will have or claim him openly at the hands of the man who believes himself its father!'

"With this the blonde gentleman throws himself upon a sofa and covers his face with his hands, as if to shut out the sight of the beauty that has been fatal to his honor, and that still has power over the stern will that animates him.

"How tiny and yet how wonderful she is, standing there beside the table in her trailing draperies of amber satin! The great yellow roses in the masses of her black hair tremble until their leaves fall and flutter away to the carpet, but I cannot see her face until by chance my eye is arrested by the long mirror that reflects her full figure.

"The change that has passed over her face since I saw it in the corridor causes the very blood to chill in my veins, and the marrow within my bones to freeze; still, I can no more relax my gaze than could I move by simple strength the foundations of the hotel in which we stand. Nervously she seems to toy with the roses on her breast, and then I see the flash of the diamonds on one small hand, as it hovers over the wine-glass. Something in appearance like a crystal globule crushes noiselessly in her delicate fingers, discharging a colorless liquid into the wine, and then, lifting the bottle of madeira, she pours out a brimming goblet of the red wine, fills up the half-emptied wine-glass, and, in a voice gentle, sorrowful and submissive, says:

"'Be it as you will, Jerome. Give me until to-morrow to arrange my plans, and then you shall have the boy. Now, drink your wine with me, and give me kind good-night, for I have need of rest.'

"The brimming goblet is already at her lips, when the blonde gentleman seizes his own glass, and, swallowing its contents in one great gulp, waits until the little lady has finished also, then takes her in his arms with a hungering greed that is horrible to witness, and I somehow find the ability to get me from the door.

"Something detained me in the corridor much against my will. I saw the little lady come out of the salon, and go away to her room with eyes that shone like stars in a Winter sky; and how long after this I kept my post, I am quite unable to say; but, at last, that for which I had waited came—a heavy fall in No. 8 aroused me from my stupor, and, sounding an alarm, I rushed into the salon.

"The tall, blonde gentleman lay at full length upon the carpet, and, as I knew at a glance, dead; but, before all else, I saw an open window, and a wine-glass standing upon the table, and then, through the frantic ringing of bells and the rush of feet upon the stairs, I could distinguish the shiver of glass coming in violent contact with the stones of the street, and all else is confusion.

"I am dimly conscious that some one at some time whispered in my ear:

"'You are a discreet, prudent man, and ought to be able to see that a close mouth will bring you profit where a long tongue could only work you mischief.'

"But it is quite certain that whatever happened in No. 8, Glitz alone is beset with fancies concerning it that shape themselves into something tragic."

Here the old fellow drew in his breath with a quaking shudder, looked nervously and fearfully over his shoulder towards the door, and then, thrusting his hand into an inner breast-pocket of his threadbare coat and drawing thence a dainty kerchief of fine lawn and lace, held it a moment before my eyes, and said, in a terse, shrill whisper:

"Monsieur sees that it is important that I shall keep an eye upon No. 8 until the owner returns to look for this mouchoir, otherwise trouble might come of it, and the one thing which a waiter cannot afford to lose is his reputation for discretion; but it requires much to keep the chill out of one's bones, although the heart shall be warm with devotion, and monsieur will comprehend that old Glitz is the victim of one idea—one fancy most horrible—that only the liqueur lends to him the courage to support."

I pass the cut-glass decanter to the poor old chap, shivering in the rays of a bright fire, and, turning to "Barnaby Rudge," recall the conclusions of Solomon Daisy:

"Everybody now knew that the gardener must be the murderer, and though he has never been heard of from that time to this, he still be, mark my words." . . . . "Sooner or later that man will be discovered."

Worth, the King of Fashion.

A CORRESPONDENT who recently visited Worth's, the shrine of fashion in Paris, writes: "Making good use of my eyes, I followed the chief priestess through several rooms, where ladies sat in solemn silence, regarding attentively the endless variety of silks and satins spread before them. Scarcely a word could be heard; if anybody spoke, it was in a whisper. Presently we reached another room, where we were left alone for a few minutes, and then there entered the great Mogul himself, the maker of fashions for half the women in Europe. Mr. Worth was not all that fancy had painted him; in fact, he was nothing more than a shrewd, active, business-like looking man, with a head so like the portraits of Oliver Goldsmith that doubtless the resemblance has often been commented upon. He shook hands with my friends, and when asked how he was he declared that he was 'assassinated' by the hot weather, and almost overwhelmed with work. He had on an alpaca coat with pins stuck in and near the collar, for use in the exercise of his craft, and a red necktie which bore marks of the 'assassinating' weather. Every instant one or other of the attendants came in to ask him a question or receive an order. 'I am run down on every side,' said he; 'at this moment four ladies are waiting for me to see their dresses tried on. But do not go away—come with me.' Thus saying, he led the way to an apartment which seemed to be the inner sanctuary, for an affiche warned off all intruders. A portière was pulled aside and there was suddenly revealed what looked like a 'lay figure,' standing upon a pedestal in the middle of the room, with several female attendants bustling actively round about it. Towards this object Mr. Worth advanced with quick steps, and the figure moved, and even turned its head; and then I saw that it was a real live woman, one of the ladies of the establishment, who was having a dress tried on by way of experiment, before it was shown to the customer. She, too, had a bewitching figure, but of course I fixed my attention upon the dress and regarded not the wearer.

When Mr. Worth approached the attendants fell back and stood in a respectful group near the young woman on the pedestal. The master himself cast a rapid glance over the work of art which had been produced under his direction, and then he began sticking in pins almost as rapidly as the eye could follow him, and tearing out others which less skillful hands had already placed in the dress. Presently he called for the 'pattern book,' and turned over many samples before he found the exact trimming which he wanted. He tried the effect of this by placing it on the dress, and then resumed his work of pinning or unpinning—like a sculptor who was engaged in putting the finishing touches to his statue. The dress itself was a beautiful object, but not too beautiful for the charming young lady who is destined to wear it. It was drawn and designed by Mr. Worth, and its progress was evidently watched with the utmost interest by the whole staff. The attendants flocked in to look at it, and the young lady upon whom it was being fitted seemed as proud as a duchess. It was wonderful what changes the hand of the master made in a few minutes—here a piece was ripped up in order that a more graceful outline might be secured; there a new trimming or decoration was introduced, and everywhere a few touches effected an obvious improvement. It was a ball dress, such as young ladies dream of in inspired visions. If placed in a room by itself it would attract universal admiration. What then will be the effect when the fair owner adds her own beauty to it?

Nearly all the fabrics used in the dresses made by Mr. Worth are manufactured from designs of his own, for he is a great inventor, and even at his dinner-table a sheet of paper is often by his side, and on it he draws designs for some new costume destined to captivate the male sex and fill the other sex with envy. Dress with Mr. Worth is a fine art, worthy of calling into exercise the highest human faculties. It was he who invented those wonderful chamois under-garments which are supposed to add so much to the already irresistible attractions of the nobler part of creation. He knows everybody, and seems to be an acute judge of character. Of one lady he said: 'She looks as if she wished to be always sipping poison, and to administer large doses to her friends.' When some one else was mentioned, he remarked: 'She is so much done up in her own current jelly, that it is quite hopeless to approach her.' Not that his sayings were always in this caustic vein—he has his favorites, and among them are the American ladies, many of whom are his best customers. They possess the requisite figures to enable him to do justice to his art. For them he exerts all his talents. He has made himself acquainted with the history and belongings of most of the best-known New York families—perhaps as a matter of caution, for Mr. Worth, like our old friend Dogberry, has doubtless had 'his losses.' He can tell you who Mrs. So-and-so was before her marriage, and whether her father left her any money, and how much her husband has got. All this sort of information is doubtless useful to a man of business whose bills cannot but be a trifle long, for excellence in any field of life has to be paid for.

The great English clothes-maker for men is not cheap, and yet in a man's attire there is no room whatever for the play of fancy and the exercise of ingenuity. The great and critical point of 'trimming' never has to be decided. And it is upon that point that Mr. Worth is so great an authority. One of the friends whom I accompanied had a magnificent Indian shawl which she wished to have converted into a mantle. It was a beautiful shawl, the finest I ever saw, and it cost originally about $1,500. The shape of the mantle having been decided, there came to the front the momentous question of trimming—in this case merely a trimming for the edge. One or two suggestions were made, but after a few moments' reflection, the celebrated artist came out with an idea which was at once admitted to be the best that could possibly be presented, even if all the dressmakers in the world were assembled in solemn conference on the question. One point only astonished me in the learned disquisition pronounced by Professor Worth. There were in this Indian shawl some very fine touches of green of that particular shade which cannot be produced out of the Vale of Cashmere. In an Indian house which I once visited the door of every room was composed solely of a grand shawl presented by the Maharajah of Cashmere, and each shawl was selected as the finest example of the workman's skill. The green in those shawls was of a lovely shade, beautifully blended with other colors, and in the shawl placed before Mr. Worth there was the same rich tint here and there. The remark which he made and which took me so completely aback was simply this: 'Madame, we must suppress the green.' Suppress the green! Oh, Mr. Worth! Surely that was a conception which owed its origin to the assassinating weather and which thy excellent judgment would repudiate in cooler moments.

The French are supposed to be the greatest devisers of dress and ornament in the world, but Mr. Worth has gone into their own stronghold and beaten them. He is, as everybody knows, an Englishman, and long held a position in the house of Swan & Edgar in London, where his peculiar abilities soon marked him out for promotion. He is now a French citizen, and has two sons who look more French than English, and who have served or are serving their prescribed term in the army. The Parisian modistes no longer contest Mr. Worth's superiority. They adopt the simpler and easier cost of following meekly in his footsteps.

The Pope's Finances.

WE hear from Rome that Cardinal Jacobini has been nominated by the Pope to the post once held by the astute Antonelli, and more recently by Cardinal Nina. Nina is destined for the office of Prefect of the Papal Court—a functionary charged with the supervision of the Pontiff's real and personal estates, as well as with the administration of his fixed and fluctuating revenues. His Eminence will also preside over a committee of Cardinals and prelates, about to be appointed for the purpose of reorganizing the Peter's pence fund, the productiveness of which has fallen off year by year since the death of Pius IX. It appears that, despite the many reductions in his household expenditure effected by Leo XIII., the outlay of the Holy See still amounts to nearly 3,000,000 lire annually, towards which total Papal investments in foreign stocks, etc., only contribute about a million and a half. Thus it becomes desirable that the Peter's pence should be made to yield as much as will balance the Pontifical budget, and even a trifle more, wherewith by degrees to augment the capital invested abroad. The Pope still declines to accept the income—three and a quarter millions of lire—offered to him by the Italian Government, although it has lately been proposed that this subvention should take the form of a personal contribution to the Peter's pence fund on the part of their Majesties the King and Queen of Italy. As, however, the deficit in his revenues must be made up somehow, it is expected that a strong appeal to the faithful will shortly be promulgated at the instigation of the committee above referred to, with the object of achieving this desideratum.

Armenian Reformers.

A CORRESPONDENT from Sivas, in Armenia, writes hopefully of the reforms introduced in that town and province. The Armenian Patriarch of Armenia, visiting that portion of his flock, has reduced by over one-half the tax paid by young girls who become married. His Eminence has also reduced by two or three days and as many nights the duration of marriage ceremonies. He has interdicted the employment of children in a watch factory, the main industrial enterprise of the place (no pun intended), and the long apprenticeships which were usual. Wine and all noise and disturbance at weddings, which invariably accompany each other, are also vetoed by this Church dignitary, who, it appears, has extensive powers of dispensation and prohibition. Finally, this energetic pastor made a vigorous search amongst all the marriageable young people, who, on account of the bad crops, the Kurds, or general indecision, had not yet selected helpmates, harangued them favorably into matrimony, assisted them materially in making a choice of partners, and married them off at the rate of over twenty couples a day. The correspondent's little daughter, aged barely three months, was formally asked in marriage by a far-sighted mother, a Guzunti woman, who had a son of about the same tender age.

Irish Landlords in Mail.

A DUBLIN correspondent writes: "I have just had the melancholy pleasure of seeing at a Pall Mall armorer's establishment some steel coats which have been ordered by several Irish landlords. It may be taken as a fact established by repeated tests that it is impossible to make a coat of armor or shirt of mail light enough to be worn by men of ordinary strength that will withstand a rifle bullet striking the person squarely. An arrangement like that of Kelly, the Australian bushranger, is, of course, an article of no sort of use, being hideous to the sight and cumbersome. But it is possible to make a steel coat that will withstand the revolver bullet, which is itself a considerable step in advance. The coat of mail will not even do this, and experiment has proved that not only will a revolver bullet penetrate a coat of chain mail, but it will carry some of the steel rings along with it and aggravate the danger and painfulness of the wound. The coats I saw will prevent the penetration of any revolver bullet at ten paces, and will cause a rifle bullet to glance if it does not strike squarely. To the outward view these coats are ordinary English shooting-jackets, and no one seeing it upon another person would imagine for a moment that there was defensive armor underneath. First is the Scotch tweed, then a thin wadding of cotton, next a layer of narrow, thin bands of tempered steel, kept in place much as whalebone is put into corsets, only the steel bands are very close together, being sewed into fine canvas and with simply a line of stitching between each piece. Three thicknesses of these steel bands, sewed into canvas in the same way, comprise the sole armor in the coat. Another piece of wadding is placed between the bands and the final lining, and the coat is complete. The steel bands are not long, so that the coat does not look stiff, but hangs naturally about the figure. The weight of the coat, when lifted, seems very heavy; but when worn the weight is distributed, and, falling mainly on the shoulders, it does not inconvenience the wearer at all. I saw several large revolver bullets fired into it at ten or eleven paces, but they only made slight dents in the steel. The only merit claimed for the coat, however, is that it diminishes the chances of a fatal wound in the body from any weapon. The arms are not protected, and the landlord may be winged; the head is not protected, nor are the legs; but the assassin, as a general thing, fires at the body, as offering an easier mark. The prices of these shot-proof jackets are $125, which is very reasonable, considering their value to those who travel about under sentence of death from the Ribbonmen or Molly Maguires.

A Russian Officer's Idea of Honor.

A STRANGE story, illustrative of the extraordinary eccentricities for which Russian military officers of late years have rendered themselves unpleasantly notorious, comes from St. Petersburg. It appears that recently a lady of rank was traveling on the Pastovo line of railway in a first-class compartment, the only other occupant of which was an elderly cavalry captain, with whom she casually entered into conversation. Arrived at the Ustinovka Station, she summoned a gendarme and informed him that she missed a hundred and sixty rubles from her hand-bag and suspected her traveling companion of having stolen them. A few minutes previously she had requested him to take her ticket out of the bag, which he had done, and since that time she had discovered her loss. Search was forthwith instituted upon the captain's person for the missing money, and a hundred-ruble note was found thrust into one of his boots. No sooner had the evidence of his guilt been brought to light than he produced a small parcel of bank notes from his pocket, with the remark, "As you have got the hundred rubles, I may as well give you the other sixty." Directly after he had spoken he drew a revolver, placed its muzzle against his right temple and blew his brains out. Insensible to the dishonor of theft, that of detection seemed to him so insupportable that, rather than endure it, he died by his own hand.

The Extent of our Unsold Public Lands.

IN spite of the prodigal way in which the public lands of the United States have been distributed of late years, there still remains a large body, surveyed and unsurveyed, to be disposed of. This is exclusive of Alaska, which is not supposed to contain much land suitable for cultivation. The public lands surveyed during last year amounted to 15,699,253 acres, making, with the previous surveys, a total of 762,567,195 acres in all surveyed, and leaving an estimated area of 1,062,231,727 acres yet to be surveyed. The annual survey is about double the number annually disposed of. How much really arable lands remain for the settler to take up cannot, of course, be determined from the land office reports, nor do the best authorities agree as to the proportion of good land to the whole domain.

Wheat Production in Canada.

ENGLISH capitalists have not been slow to see the prospective value of the great stretches of wheat-producing lands lying northward and westward of the great Lakes which must be traversed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The time is not far distant when Canada will be, next to Russia, our most formidable competitor in making good the bread deficiencies of the more densely populated States of Europe. The movement has already commenced, and it will not be confined to European trade, as the subsidies granted to the new Brazilian-Canadian line of steamships gives us fair notice. The Montreal Herald, in reviewing the European grain trade of Canada, states that this year 996,983 bushels of grain alone were shipped to Antwerp from that port, against 843,563 bushels during the whole season of 1879, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. The total quantity of grain shipped to all Continental ports this year amounts to 1,321,231 bushels, against 697,479 bushels in 1879. If the unoccupied plains of the Northwest, farmed after the style adopted by American farmers in Dakota, are hereafter made to pour their tribute by short land and water routes into the common stock of marketable grain, the Canadian contingent will have an appreciable influence in fixing the price of our own.

The Resources of Georgia.

THERE are wide areas of fine farming lands in Georgia that lie untouched by husbandmen in belts of country as healthy as any in the Union. There is also an enterprising spirit abroad in the State manifesting itself in a rapidly-growing investment in manufacturing enterprises. From a recent official report we learn that "there are now in operation in Georgia fifty gold mills, with nearly 500 stamps, representing a capital of nearly $800,000, brought into the State from the North and West during the last five years, and that new investments are constantly being made. As evidence of Georgia's mineral wealth, it is reported that iron ore has been found in 71 counties, gold ore in 61, limestone in 48, granite in 45, quartz in 46, soapstone in 22, asbestos in 28, corundum in 9, copper in 27, kaolin in 11, manganese in 15, and marble in 6. A survey shows that more than 600 streams afford water power which can be used for cotton factories and other manufactures." Why should not the tide of emigration that sets westward from the Eastern and Middle States pour itself southward? From Virginia to Georgia the South Atlantic States offer inducements greater than the distant plains of Kansas and Nebraska, and a climate incomparably superior.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Road between Cattaro and Cettinge.

The Bay of Cattaro, where the vessels of the allied fleet proceeded from the somewhat dangerous anchorage at Gravosa, is one of the best harbors in the Adriatic. Two rocks divide the entrance into three separate channels, two of which admit the largest ships. The town itself is walled and fortified, and, though of small size, it contains a cathedral, a collegiate church, and is the seat of the administration of a bishop. The road leading from Cattaro to Cettinge is as picturesque as can be found anywhere, being at once irregular, abrupt, sharply inclined and pleasantly level.

Measuring the Sunshine at Greenwich.

The contrivance in the Royal Astronomical Observatory at Greenwich for simply indicating the continuance or interruption of sunshine is a solid glass ball, of four inches diameter, placed in the centre of a bowl which is marked round the rim like a sun-dial; the ball is supported at an inch distance apart from the bottom and interior sides of the bowl; and a narrow strip of millboard, made black with stout ink, is laid all around inside the bowl, so as to be everywhere equidistant one inch from the glass. Whenever the sun is shining, the glass ball acts as a burning glass, and burns a reddish mark along the black band, which is just within its focus. If the sunshine be intermittent, this line becomes fragmentary, so that, at the end of the day, when the strip of mill-board is removed for examination, there is a record of the greater or less amount of clear sunshine.

The French Religious Decrees.

The execution of the new religious decrees is proceeding in France with more or less excitement, much threatening and occasional excommunications of the authorities by the "evicted." On the morning of November 5th the work in Paris began. The threatened confraternities had been looking out for many nights for the agent of the Prefect of Police. The night previous the Faubourg St. Honore was kept in a state of alarm by the discharge of revolvers in the precincts of the Dominican and Passionist Convents. In the Rue St. Petersburg, where the Oblats have an establishment—in the Rue de Sante, in which there is a Capuchin monastery—and in the Rue St. Jean Beauvais, where there is a Dominican one, the same cause produced similar effects. The Franciscans in the Boulevard Menilmontant kept quiet. But everywhere else grand seigneurs went to make a rampart of their bodies around the good Fathers. The gentlemen of the De Broglie family, including the noble Duke himself, M. Albert Gigot, ex-Prefect of Police, and divers reactionist members of the Senate and Chamber, including the fire-eating Paul de Cassagnac, had watched for many nights with the Dominican Fathers, and were spectators of their eviction. The Moral Order Duke was cut short in a speech he was making, in order to excite to sedition, by M. Nadaud, a police magistrate, who collared him and slung him into the street. Senator Depeyer twisted the police agents with obeying Commanards who "shot them ten years ago. Everywhere great force had to be employed. Hatchets were used by the fire brigade and by the sappers to smash in doors, and in some convents the agents of authority resorted to crowbars. At La Rue de la Sante (the Capuchins) there was a gathering of Clerical and Moral Order journalists—Hebrews for the most part, and unconverted ones to boot. When hatchets were applied to the outer door, these worthies and their lay and clerical friends raised the cries of "Stop the brigands! Down with the housebreakers!" A splinter of wood struck the doctor of the establishment in the forehead. When the sappers had got through their work the Superior came forward to excommunicate Police Officer Clement, who politely took off his hat and then asked had the reverend Father anything more to say. Our illustrations, representing the ovation and demonstrations of sympathy by the people of Marseilles towards the expelled Capuchins, and Father Arsene, provincial of the monastery of the same Order in Paris, bestowing his benediction upon the witnesses of his withdrawal from the monastery, will give the reader a pretty accurate idea of the manner in which the proscribed religious houses are being emptied.

The Laurrium Silver Mines in Greece.

On the southern promontory of Attica, near Cape Colonna and the conspicuous ruins of the ancient Temple of Minerva, overlooking the Ægean Sea, is the little port, with the village and extensive range of buildings, occupied by the modern industry of the Laurrium silver mines. These mines began to be worked, in a rude fashion, at a very early date; but such operations were probably not undertaken on a considerable scale until after the expulsion of Hippias and the establishment of a democratic constitution by Cleisthenes. It seems to have been the practice of the Athenian Government to lease out particular sections of the mining district for a long term of years to individuals or companies, who carried on the industry, and who paid down a large sum, by way of fine, at the granting of the lease, besides a reserved yearly rent, estimated at the twenty-fourth part of the gross produce. The Laurrium district was surveyed in 1836 by Dr. Fridler, who has described the ancient mining shafts, washing-places for ore, and furnaces constructed and used by the Greeks more than 2,000 years ago.

—THE European Ambassadors at Constantinople have agreed to exercise no further pressure upon the Porte relative to pending questions.

—A NEW Prussian politico-economical council has been formed by royal decree with a membership of seventy-five, of whom fifteen must by workingmen.

—WHITE EAGLE and a delegation of Poncas are shortly to visit Washington to make arrangements for the removal of the tribe to the Indian Territory.

—SEVERAL vessels of the Revenue Marine Service have been designated by the President to cruise during the Winter months for the relief of distressed vessels.

—A DISPATCH from St. Petersburg says orders have been given for the immediate formation of a small army corps on the Persian frontier for the purpose of watching the Kurdish revolt.

—IT is to be feared that there is little hope that war between Egypt and Abyssinia will be long averted. Late reports say that orders have been issued from Cairo to drive back the Abyssinians by force.

—IT is said that the members of the Irish Land League have invested all their funds in foreign securities and lodged them in the Continental Bank, and removed their books and papers to a place of safety.

—IT is less than fifty years since the first railroad was built in this State. On the 29th day of July, 1830, ground was broken for the construction of a line by the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Company.

—A REPUBLICAN reform movement has been started in Philadelphia, headed by a committee of one hundred citizens. The movement looks to the emancipation of the city government from Ring control.

—EIGHT months ago the Methodist churches of Detroit, Mich., formed a debt-paying union, and have since paid off all their debts. Thursday last was devoted to Thanksgiving services as a celebration of their success.

—EMIGRATION offices are to be opened throughout Great Britain in furtherance of a scheme of Anglo-Canadian emigration. An emigration syndicate, of which Sir John A. Galt is the head, is looking after the project.

—CAREFUL estimates, based on partial returns, place the total sugar crop of Louisiana for the present year at 231,000 hogsheads, a large increase over 1879. The yield of molasses is estimated at 13,000,000 gallons.

—A DISPATCH from Kief reports that a great outbreak of typhus has taken place in the prison there, where there is a number of Nihilists confined. Two hundred out of 750 prisoners have been stricken with the fever.

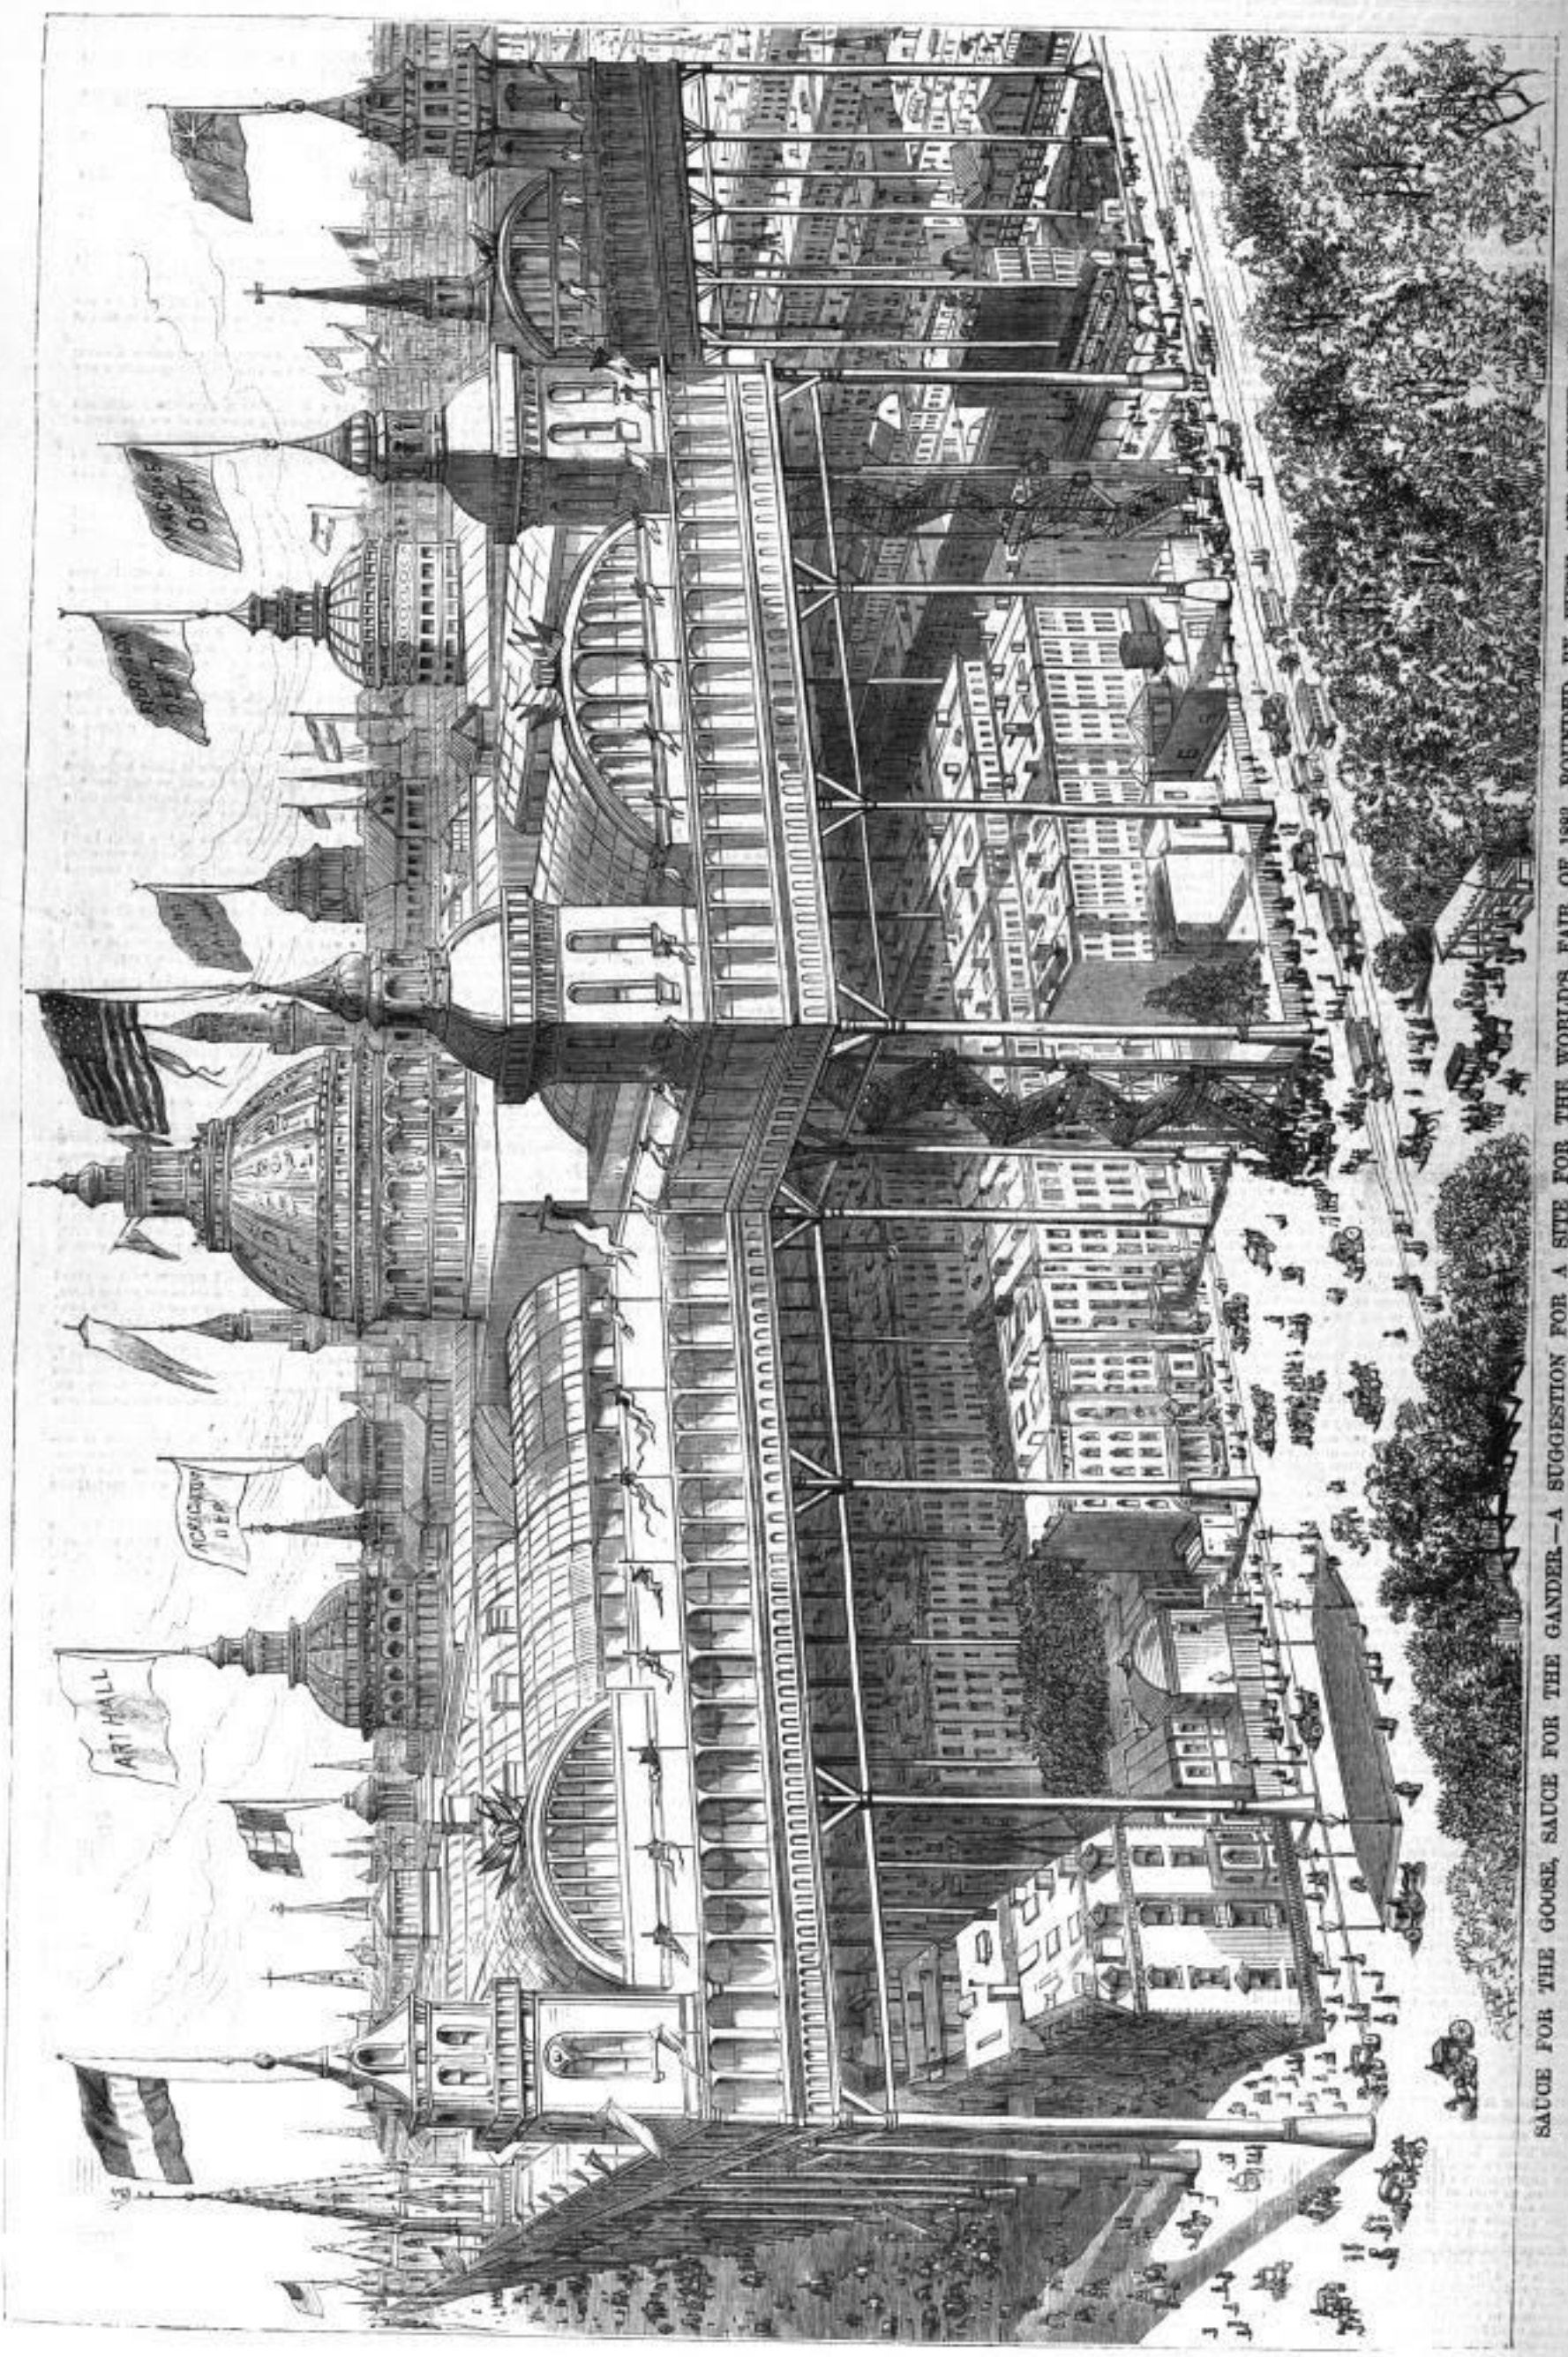
—FOURTEEN men were arrested in Cork, Ireland, last week, for participating in a Fenian procession, from which shots were fired at the police. Mr. Healey, Mr. Parnell's secretary, has been elected to Parliament from County Wexford.

—THE demand for American securities is immensely active in England. Among speculative securities none are so largely dealt in now as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio first mortgages, which are believed to present a good margin for a rise.

—THE State Engineer's report shows that at the end of the fiscal year, September 30th, 1879, there were 236 railroad companies that had roads in this State, representing a capital of $461,589,485, and earning a revenue of $106,792,939 per annum.

—FIVE workmen were precipitated into the Harlem River on November 26th, by the fall of the staging between two piers of the new bridge at One Hundred and Fifty-eighth Street. One man was instantly killed and the rest more or less severely injured.

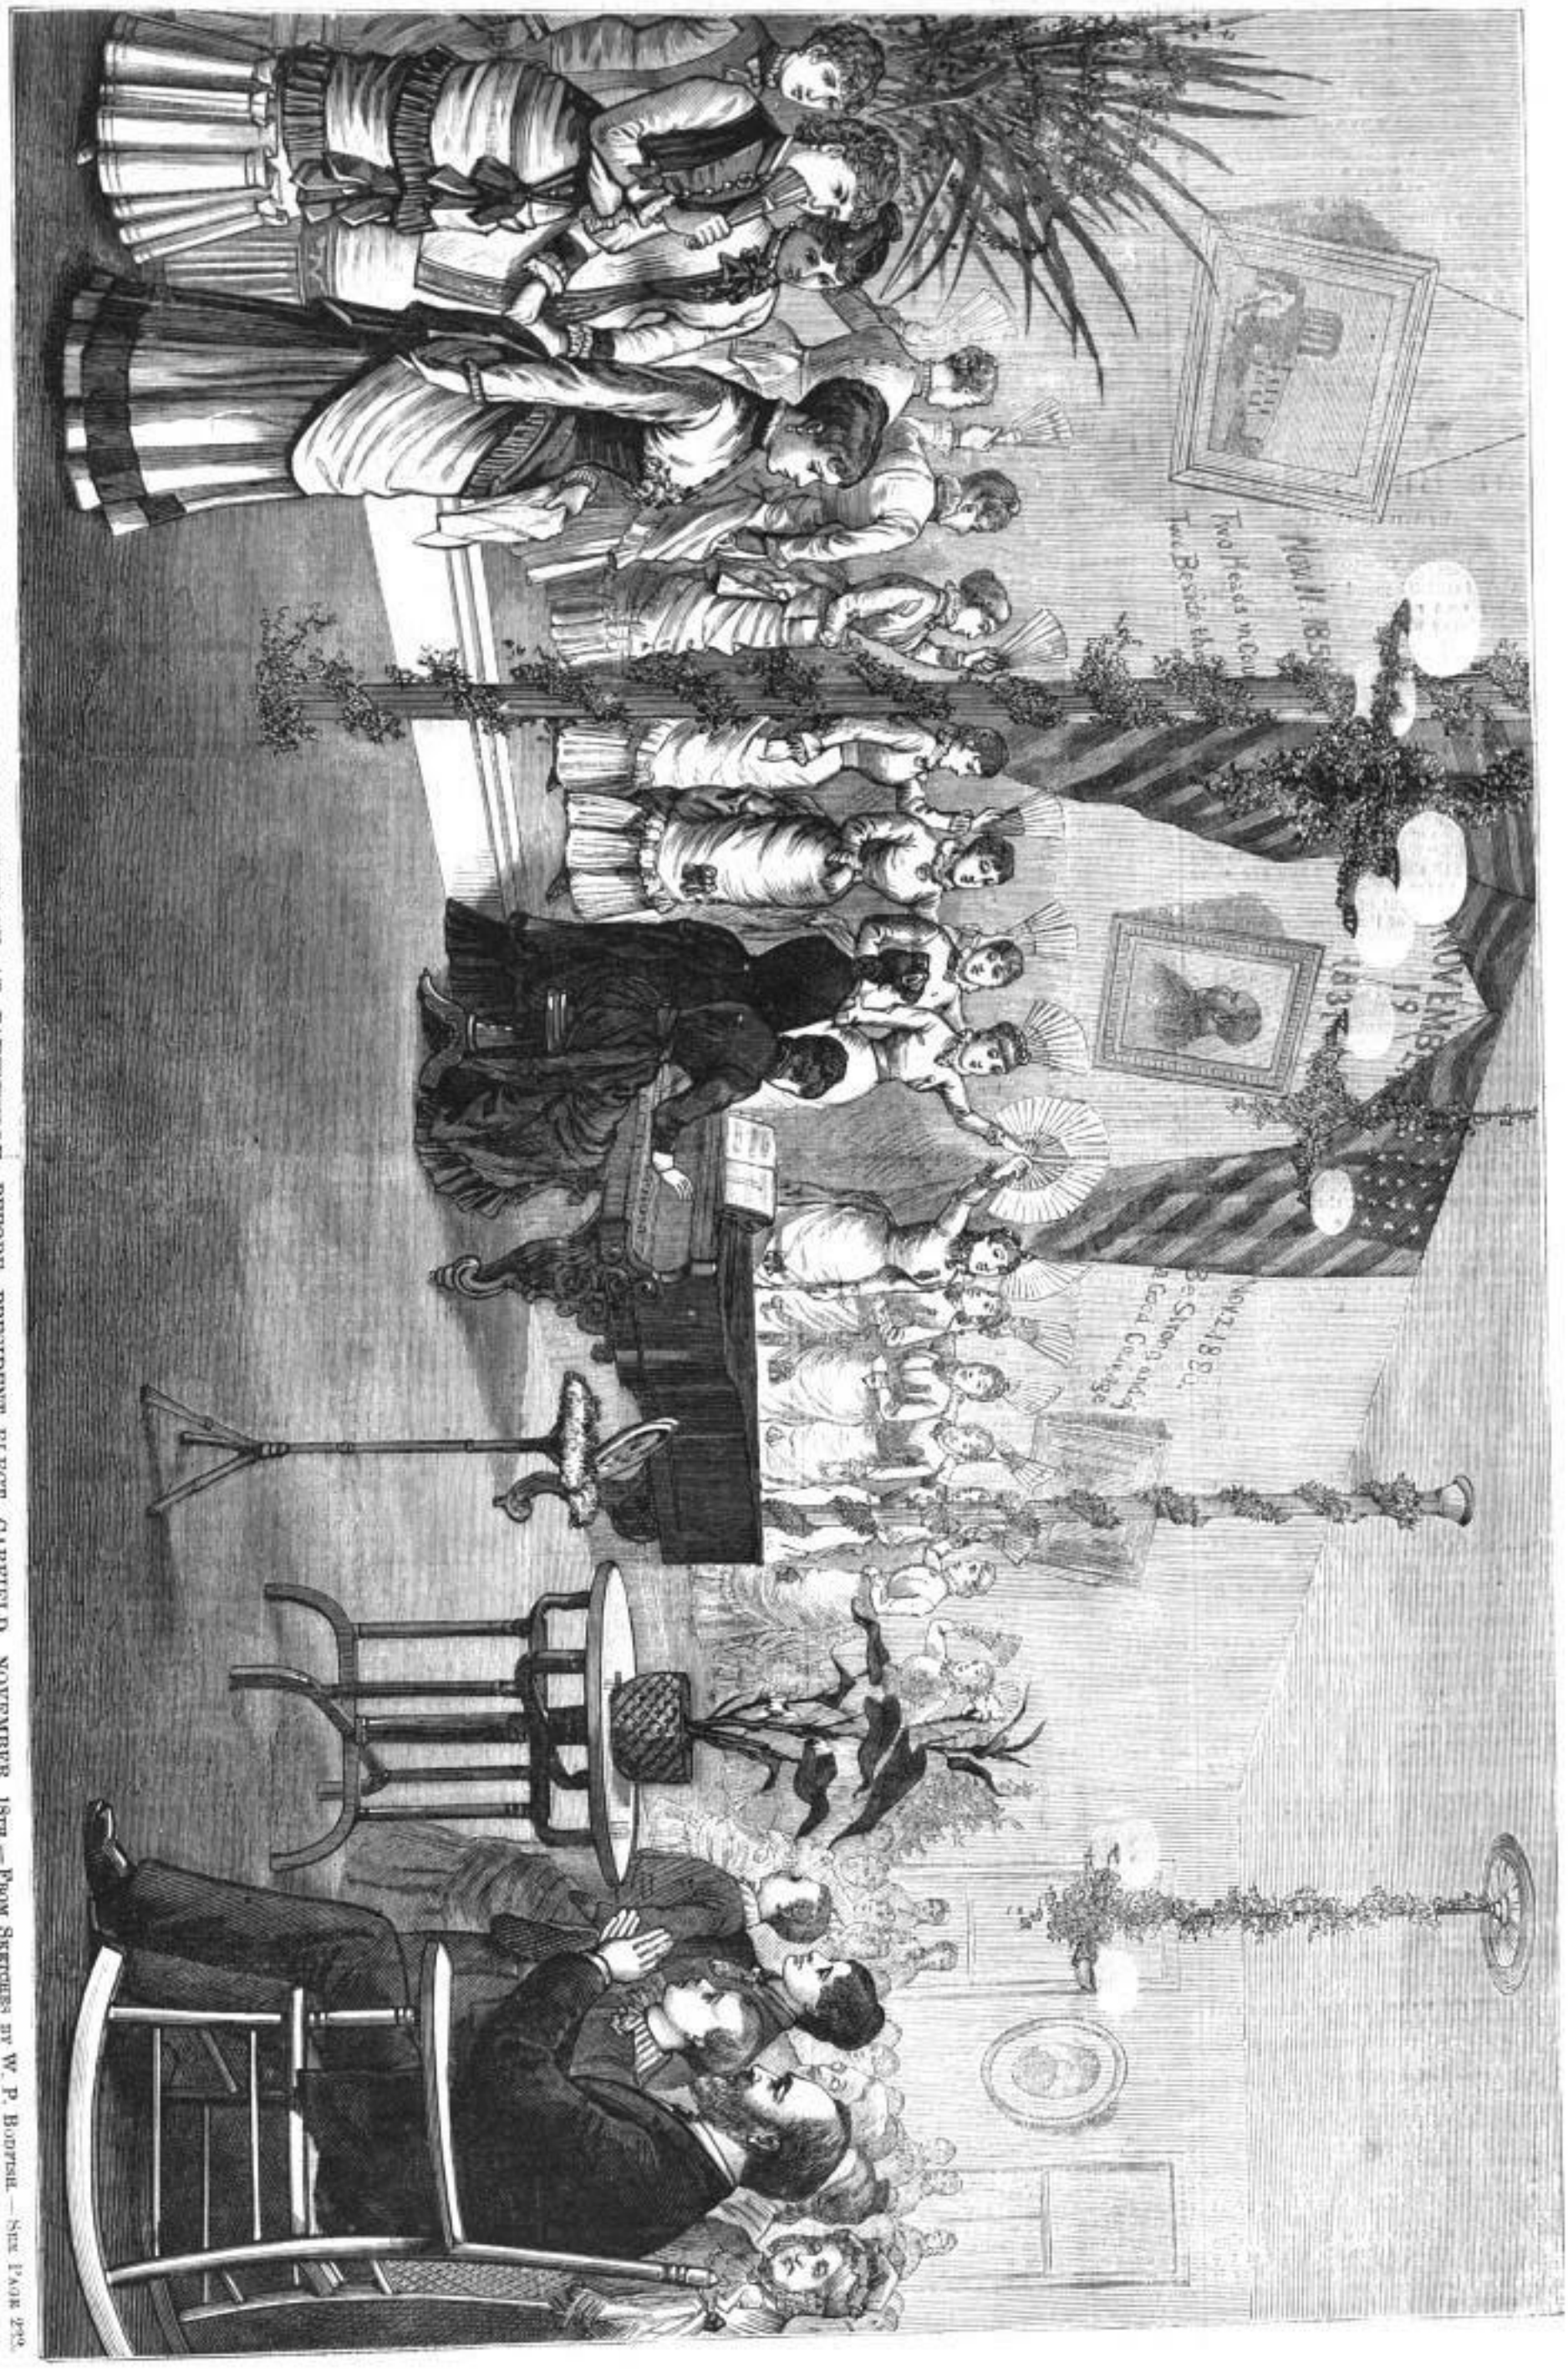
—THERE is now about $85,000,000 in gold bullion standing to the credit of the United States Treasurer, out of which it has been decided to coin monthly $10,000,000 in denominations of $5 and $10. No gold coins of a less denomination than $5 will be coined at present.



—A DISPATCH from Indianapolis, Ind., says that R. S. Parker, a Republican elector nominated in place of General Thomas W. Bennett, has been defeated through the blunder of omitting his name from the Republican tickets. This will elect D. W. Chambers, the Democratic elector, by about 5,000 majority.

—THE steamer Ortigia came in collision on the morning of November 24th with the French steamer Oncle Joseph near Spezzia. The Oncle Joseph was so much injured that she soon sank. She had 300 persons on board, only about fifty of whom were saved. The Ortigia arrived at Leghorn, having also been severely damaged. An inquiry has been opened.

—THE Chamber of Deputies has adopted, by a vote of 235 to 169, clause eight of the Magistracy Reform Bill, which suspends for a year the principle of irremovability of the magistrates. The clauses of the Magistracy Reform Bill, adopted by the Chamber of Deputies, include one for nominating chief judges for a term of five years. A Radical amendment that judges be elected by universal suffrage was rejected by a vote of 172 to 135. The Magistracy Reform Bill as a whole was then agreed to.



—THE most remarkable and unexpected feature of the population returns of Philadelphia is the fact that the native-born population has increased in a greater proportion than the foreign-born—in short, that in spite of immigration, always greatest to a manufacturing centre, the native Americans have multiplied faster than the foreigners. In 1870 they were 72.7 per cent. of the whole, but now they constitute more than three-fourths, or 75.8. There has also been a small increase in the proportion of males, who then constituted 47½ per cent. of the whole, against 48 per cent. now.

SUMMON ME BACK.

SUMMON me back from the gates of death,
You that have loved me for ever so long:
Call with your kisses my fast fleeting breath.
Wake me once more with your marvelous song.
I cannot go while you are caressing me,
Your loving eyes keep the monster away,
He will withdraw while your lips are still blessing me,
Granting me life if 'twere but for a day.

Oh, but my love, with the world closing round me,
All that I leave seems a profitless dream,
Only one phase of the phantom has found me
Staying my craft on life's perilous stream.
It was your love and my own great devotion,
Guided my course to a sheltering shore,
Kept my frail bark from the turbulent ocean,
Safe from the rapids of life ever more.

That is the only remains of life's treasure
I shall retain when I yield up this earth,
Love, and your memory, dealt without measure,
Glowing, I know it, into a new birth.
Sing to me, darling, while life is still holding me,
Sing me the songs of the time that is old,
Kiss me still yet, while your arms are enfolding me,
I cannot go till your love has grown cold.

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

CHAPTER XL.—(CONTINUED).

LADY LORING found Miss Eyrecourt in her own room. The little portrait of Romayne which she had drawn from recollection lay on the table before her. She was examining it with the closest attention.

"Well, Stella, and what does the portrait tell you?"

"What I knew before, Adelaide. There is nothing false and cruel in that face."

"And does the discovery satisfy you? For my part, I despise Romayne for hiding himself from us. Can you excuse him?"

Stella locked up the portrait in her writing-case. "I can wait," she said, quietly.

This assertion of patience seemed to irritate Lady Loring. "What is the matter with you this morning?" she asked. "You are more reserved than ever."

"No; I am only out of spirits, Adelaide. I can't help thinking of that meeting with Winterfield. I feel as if some misfortune was hanging over my head."

"Don't speak of that hateful man!" her ladyship exclaimed. "I have something to tell you about Romayne. Are you completely absorbed in your presentiments of evil, or do you think you can listen to me?"

Stella's face answered for her. Lady Loring described the interview with Major Hynd in the minutest detail—including, by way of illustration, the major's manners and personal appearance. "He and Lord Loring," she added, "both think that Romayne will never hear the last of it, if he allows these foreigners to look to him for money. Until something more is known about them, the letter is not to be forwarded."

"I wish I had the letter!" cried Stella.

"Would you send it to the bankers?"

"Instantly! Does it matter whether these poor French people are worthy of Romayne's generosity? If it restores his tranquillity to help them, who cares whether they deserve the help? They are not even to know who it is that assists them—Romayne is to be their unknown friend. It is he, not they, whom we have to think of—his peace of mind is everything; their merit is nothing. I say it's cruel to Ada to keep him in ignorance of what has happened. Why didn't you take the letter away from Major Hynd?"

"Gently, Stella! The major is going to make inquiries about the widow and children, when he returns to London."

"When he returns!" Stella repeated, indignantly. "Who knows what the poor wretches may be suffering in the interval, and what Romayne may feel if he ever hears of it? Tell me the address again—it was somewhere in Islington, you said."

"Why do you want to know it?" Lady Loring asked. "You are not going to write to Romayne yourself?"

"I am going to think before I do anything. If you can't trust my discretion, Adelaide, you have only to say so!"

It was spoken sharply. Lady Loring's reply betrayed a certain loss of temper on her side.

"Manage your own affairs, Stella; I have done meddling with them." Her unlucky visit to Romayne at the hotel had been a subject of dispute between the two friends, and this referred to it. "You shall have the address," my lady added, in her grandest manner. She wrote it on a piece of paper and left the room.

Easily irritated, Lady Loring had the merit of being easily appeased. That meanest of all vices, the vice of sullenness, had no existence in her nature. In five minutes she regretted her little outburst of irritability. For five minutes more she waited, on the chance that Stella might be the first to seek a reconciliation. The interval passed and nothing happened.

"Have I really offended her?" Lady Loring asked herself. The next moment she was on her way back to Stella. The room was empty. She rang the bell for the maid.

"Where is Miss Eyrecourt?"

"Gone out, my lady."

"Did she leave no message?"

"No, my lady. She went away in a great hurry."

Lady Loring at once drew the conclusion that Stella had rashly taken the affair of the General's family into her own hands. Was it possible to say how this most imprudent proceeding might end? After hesitating and reflecting, and hesitating again, Lady Loring's anxiety got beyond her control. She not only decided on following Stella, but, in the excess of her nervous apprehension, she took one of the men-servants with her in case of emergency.

CHAPTER XII.—THE GENERAL'S FAMILY.

NOT always remarkable for arriving at just conclusions, Lady Loring had drawn the right inference this time. Stella had stopped the first cab that passed her, and had directed the driver to Camp's Hill, Islington.

The aspect of the miserable little street, closed at one end, and swarming with dirty children quarreling over their play, daunted her for the moment. Even the cabman, drawing up at the entrance to the street, expressed his opinion that it was a queer sort of place for a young lady to venture into alone. Stella thought of Romayne. Her firm persuasion that she was helping him to perform an act of mercy, which was (to his mind) an act of atonement as well, roused her courage. She boldly approached the open door of No. 10, and knocked on it with her parasol.

The tangled gray hair and grimy face of a hideous old woman showed themselves slowly, at the end of the passage, rising from the strong-smelling obscurity of the kitchen regions.

"What do you want?" said the half-seen witch of the London slums.

"Does Madame Marillac live here?" Stella asked.

"Do you mean the foreigner?"

"Yes."

"Second floor." With those instructions, the upper half of the witch sank and vanished.

Stella gathered her skirts together, and ascended a filthy flight of stairs for the first time in her life.

Coarse voices, shameless language, gross laughter behind the closed doors of the first floor hurried her on her way to the rooms on the higher flight. Here there was a change for the better—here, at least, there was silence. She knocked at the door on the landing of the second floor. A gentle voice answered, in French, "Entrez"; then quickly substituted the English equivalent, "Come in." Stella opened the door.

The wretchedly-furnished room was scrupulously clean. Above the truckle-bed a cheap little image of the Virgin was fastened to the wall, with some faded, artificial flowers arranged above it in the form of a wreath. Two women, in dresses of coarse black stuff, sat at a small, round table, working at the same piece of embroidery. The elder of the two rose when the visitor entered the room. Her worn and weary face still showed the remains of beauty, in its finely-proportioned parts—her dim eyes rested on Stella with an expression of piteous entreaty.

"Have you come for the work, madam?" she asked, in English, spoken with a strong foreign accent. "Pray forgive me; I have not finished it yet."

The second of the two workwomen suddenly looked up.

She, too, was wan and frail; but her eyes were bright; her movements still preserved the elasticity of youth. Her likeness to the elder woman proclaimed their relationship even before she spoke.

"Ah! it's my fault!" she burst out, passionately in French. "I was hungry and tired, and I slept hours longer than I ought. My mother was too kind to wake me and set me to work. I am a selfish wretch, and my mother is an angel!" She dashed away the tears gathering in her eyes and proudly, fiercely, resumed her work.

Stella hastened to reassure them the moment she could make herself heard.

"Indeed, I have nothing to do with the work," she said, speaking in French, so that they might the more readily understand her. "I come here, Madame Marillac—if you will not be offended with me for plainly owning it—to offer you some little help."

"Charity?" asked the daughter, looking up again sternly from her needle.

"Sympathy," Stella answered, gently.

The girl resumed her work. "I beg your pardon," she said; "I shall learn to submit to my lot in time."

The quiet, long-suffering mother placed a chair for Stella. "You have a kind, beautiful face, miss," she said, "and I am sure you will make allowances for my poor girl. I remember the time when I was as quick to feel as she is. May I ask how you came to hear of us?"

"I hope you will excuse me," Stella replied. "I am not at liberty to answer that question."

The mother said nothing. The daughter asked, sharply, "Why not?"

Stella addressed her answer to the mother. "I come from a person who desires to be of service to you as an unknown friend," she said.

The wan face of the widow suddenly brightened. "Oh!" she exclaimed, "has my brother heard of the General's death, and has he forgiven me my marriage at last?"

"No, no!" Stella interposed; "I must not mislead you. The person whom I represent is no relation of yours."

Even in spite of this positive assertion, the poor woman held desperately to the hope that had been roused in her. "The name by which you know me may mislead you," she suggested, anxiously. "My late husband assumed the name in his exile here. Perhaps, if I told you ——"

The daughter stopped her there. "My dear mother, leave this to me." The widow sighed resignedly, and resumed her work. "Madame Marillac will do very well as a name," the girl continued, turning to Stella, "until we know something more of each other. I suppose you are well acquainted with the person whom you represent?"

"Certainly, or I should not be here."

"You know the person's family connections, in that case, and you can say for certain whether they are French connections or not?"

"I can say for certain," Stella answered, "that they are English connections. I represent a friend who feels kindly towards Madame Marillac: nothing more."

"You see, mother, you were mistaken. Bear it as bravely, dear, as you have borne other trials." Saying this very tenderly, she addressed herself once more to Stella, without attempting to conceal the accompanying change in her manner to coldness and distrust. "One of us must speak plainly," she said. "Our few friends are nearly as poor as we are, and they are all French. I tell you positively that we have no English friends. How has this anonymous benefactor been informed of our poverty? You are a stranger to us—you cannot have given the information?"

Stella's eyes were now opened to the awkward position in which she had placed herself. She met the difficulty boldly, still upheld by the conviction that she was serving a purpose cherished by Romayne.

"You had good reasons no doubt, mademoiselle, when you advised your mother to conceal her true name," she rejoined. "Be just enough to believe that your 'anonymous benefactor' has good reasons for concealment, too."

It was well said: and it encouraged Madame Marillac to take Stella's part.

"My dear Blanche, you speak rather harshly to this good young lady," she said to her daughter. "You have only to look at her to see that she means well."

Blanche took up her needle again with dogged submission.

"If we are to accept charity, mother, I should like to know the hand that gives it," she answered. "I will say no more."

"When you are as old as I am, my dear," rejoined Madame Marillac, "you will not think quite so positively as you think now. I have learnt some hard lessons," she proceeded, turning to Stella, "and I hope I am the better for them. My life has not been a happy one——"

"Your life has been a martyrdom!" said the girl, breaking out again in spite of herself. "Oh, my father! my father!" She pushed aside the work and hid her face in her hands.

The gentle mother spoke severely for the first time.

"Respect your father's memory!" she said. Blanche trembled and kept silence. "I have no false pride," Madame Marillac continued. "I own that we are miserably poor; and I thank you, my dear young lady, for your kind intentions towards us, without embarrassing you by any inquiries. We manage to live. While my eyes last our work helps to support us. My good eldest daughter has some employment as a teacher of music, and contributes her little share to assist our poor household. I don't distrust you; I only say, let us try a little longer if we cannot help ourselves."

She had barely pronounced the last words, when a startling interruption led to consequences which the persons present had not foreseen. A shrill, wailing voice suddenly pierced through the flimsy partition which divided the front room and the back room.

"Bread!" cried the voice; "I'm hungry. Bread! bread!"

The daughter started to her feet.

"Think of his betraying us at this moment!" she exclaimed, indignantly. The mother rose in silence, and opened a cupboard. Its position was opposite to the place in which Stella was sitting. She saw two or three knives and forks, some cups and saucers and plates, and a folded tablecloth. Nothing else appeared on the shelves: not even the stray crust of bread for which the poor woman had been looking. "Go, my dear, and quiet your brother," she said, and closed the cupboard-door again as patiently as ever.

Blanche left them. Stella opened her pocket-book as the door closed.

"For God's sake, take something!" she cried. "I offer it with the sincerest respect—I offer it as a loan!"

Madame Marillac gently signed to Stella to close the pocketbook again.

"That kind heart of yours must not be distressed about trifles," she said. "The baker will trust us until we get the money for our work, and my daughter knows it. If you can tell me nothing else, my dear, will you tell me your Christian name? It is painful to me to speak to you quite as a stranger."

Stella at once complied with the request. Madame Marillac smiled as she repeated the name.

"There is almost another tie between us," she said. "We have your name in France—it speaks with a familiar sound to me in this strange place. Dear Miss Stella, when my poor boy startled you by that cry for food, he recalled to me the saddest of all my anxieties. When I think of Ada, I should be tempted if my better sense did not restrain me—— No! no! put back the pocketbook. I am incapable of the shameless audacity of borrowing a sum of money which I could never repay. Let me tell you what my trouble is and you will understand that I am in earnest. I had two sons, Miss Stella. The elder—the most lovable, the most affectionate of my children—was killed in a duel."

The sudden disclosure drew a cry of sympathy from Stella, which she was not mistress enough of herself to repress. Now, for the first time, she understood the remorse that tortured Romayne, as she had not understood it when Lady Loring had told her the terrible story of the duel. Attributing the effect produced on her to the sensitive nature of a young woman, Madame Marillac innocently added to Stella's distress by making excuses.

"I am sorry to have frightened you, my dear," she said. "In your happy country such a dreadful death as my son's is unknown. I am obliged to mention it, or you might not understand what I have still to say. Perhaps I had better not go on?"

Stella roused herself. "Yes, yes!" she answered, eagerly. "Pray go on!"

"My son in the next room," the widow resumed, "is only fourteen years old. It has pleased God sorely to afflict a harmless creature. He has not been in his right mind since—since that miserable day when he followed the duelists and saw his brother's death. Oh, you are turning pale! How thoughtless, how cruel of me! I ought to have remembered that such horrors as these have never overshadowed your happy life!"

Struggling to recover her self-control, Stella tried to reassure Madame Marillac by a gesture. She had heard the voice which haunted Romayne—the conviction of it shook her with superstitious terror from head to foot. Not the words that had pleaded hunger and called for bread, but those other words—"Assassin, assassin, where are you?"—rang in her ears. She entreated Madame Marillac to break the unendurable interval of silence. The widow's calm voice had a soothing influence which she was eager to feel. "Go on!" she repeated. "Pray go on!"

"I ought not to lay all the blame of my boy's affliction on the duel," said Madame Marillac. "In childhood, his mind never grew with his bodily growth. His brother's death may have only hurried the result which was sooner or later but too sure to come. You need feel no fear of him. He is never violent—and he is the most beautiful of all my children. Would you like to see him?"

"No; I would rather hear you speak of him. Is he not conscious of his own misfortune?"

"For weeks together, Stella—I am sure I may call you Stella?—he is quite calm; you would see no difference, outwardly, between him and other boys. Unhappily, it is just at those times that a spirit of impatience seems to possess him. He watches his opportunity, and, however careful we may be, he is cunning enough to escape our vigilance."

"Do you mean that he leaves you and his sisters?"

"Yes, that is what I mean. For nearly two months past he has been away from us. Yesterday only his return relieved us from a state of suspense which I cannot attempt to describe. We don't know where he has been, or in the company of what persons he has passed the time of his absence. No persuasion will induce him to speak to us on the subject. This morning we listened while he was talking to himself."

Stella felt the thrill of a sudden fear. Was it part of the boy's madness to repeat the words which still echoed in Romayne's ears? "Does he ever speak of the duel?" she asked.

"Never! He seems to have lost all memory of it. We only heard, this morning, one or two unconnected words—something about a woman, and then more that appeared to allude to some person's death. Last night I was with him when he went to bed, and I found that he had something to conceal from me. He let me fold all his clothes, as usual, except his waistcoat, and that he snatched away from me, and put it under his pillow. We have no hope of being able to examine the waistcoat without his knowledge. His sleep is like the sleep of a dog; if you only approach him he wakes instantly. Forgive me for troubling you with these trifling details, only interesting to ourselves. You will at least understand the constant anxiety that we suffer."

"In your unhappy position," said Stella, "I should try to resign myself to parting with him—I mean, to placing him under medical care."

The mother's face saddened.

"I have inquired about it," she answered. "He must pass a night in the workhouse before he can be received as a pauper lunatic in a public asylum. Oh, my dear, I am afraid there is some pride still left in me! He is my only son now; his father was a General in the French army; I was brought up among people of good blood and breeding; I can't take my own boy to the workhouse!"

Stella took her hand.

"I feel for you with all my heart," she said. "Place him privately, dear Madame Marillac, under skillful and kind control, and let me, do let me, open the pocket-book again!"

The widow steadily refused even to look at the pocketbook.

"Perhaps," Stella persisted, "you don't know of a private asylum that would satisfy you?"

"My dear, I do know of such a place. The good doctor who attended my husband in his last illness told me of it. A friend of his receives a certain number of poor people into his house, and charges no more than the cost of maintaining them. An unattainable sum to me! There is the temptation that I spoke of. The help of a few pounds I might accept, if I fell ill, because I might afterwards pay it back. But a larger sum—never!"

She rose as if to end the interview. Stella tried every means of persuasion that she could think of, and tried in vain. The friendly dispute between them might have been prolonged, if they had not both been silenced by another interruption from the next room.

This time it was not only endurable, it was even welcome. The poor boy was playing the air of a French vaudeville on a pipe or flageolet.

"Now he is happy!" said the mother. "He is a born musician; do come and see him!"

An idea struck Stella. She overcame the inveterate reluctance in her to see the boy so fatally associated with the misery of Romayne's life. As Madame Marillac led the way to the door of communication between the rooms, she quickly took from her pocket-book the bank notes with which she had provided herself, and folded them so that they could be easily concealed in her hand.

She followed the widow into the little room.

The boy was sitting on his bed. He laid down his flageolet and bowed to Stella. His long silky hair flowed to his shoulders. But one betrayal of a deranged mind presented itself in his delicate face—his large, soft eyes had the glassy vacant look which it is impossible to mistake.

"Do you like music, mademoiselle?" he asked, gently.

Stella asked him to play his little vaudeville air again. He proudly complied with the request. His sister seemed to resent the presence of a stranger.

"The work is at a standstill," she said, and passed into the front room. Her mother followed her as far as the door to give her some necessary directions. Stella seized her opportunity. She put the bank notes into the pocket of the boy's jacket, and whispered to him:

"Give them to your mother when I have gone away." Under those circumstances she felt sure that Madame Marillac would yield to the temptation. She could resist much, but she could not resist her son.

The boy nodded, to show that he understood her. The moment after he laid down his flageolet with an expression of surprise.

"You are trembling!" he said. "Are you frightened?"

She was frightened. The mere sense of touching him made her shudder. Did she feel a vague presentment of some evil to come from that momentary association with him? Madame Marillac, turning away from her daughter, noticed Stella's agitation.

"Surely, my poor boy doesn't alarm you?" she said. Before Stella could answer, some one outside knocked at the door. Lady Loring's servant appeared, charged with a carefully-worded message.

"If you please, miss, a friend is waiting for you below." Any excuse for departure was welcome to Stella at that moment. She promised to call at the house again in a few days. Madame Marillac kissed her on the forehead as she took her leave. Her nerves were still shaken by that momentary contact with the boy. Descending the stairs, she trembled so that she was obliged to hold by the servant's arm. She was not naturally timid. What did it mean?

THE FIRE AT THE MINNESOTA INSANE HOSPITAL.

THE burning of a portion of the Minnesota Hospital for the Insane at St. Peter, in that State, on the night of November 15th, has already been referred to in our columns. The hospital was erected at a cost of over $500,000, appropriated and used at various times from the beginning in 1864 to its completion in 1877. It has accommodated from 500 to 600 unfortunate patients annually. The scenes during the fire were terrible in the extreme, and the confusion attending the removal of the inmates was simply indescribable. Many absolutely refused to leave, and had to be forced out of the building. There were 270 patients in the north wing of the building, and as they huddled out many of them betook themselves with screams of delight or in a delirium of wonder and horror to the neighboring hills, barefooted, barely clad, without hats or coats, and, in many instances, trousers or stockings. Once in the open air, the male patients in particular seemed to understand it as a grand picnic, in which they were at liberty to do as they pleased. Some of the more tractable wandered to the barn, as they were told to do, but the majority, with that fatal cunning which distinguishes the insane, broke at once for the hills and sqoatted in the snow. Many continued their journey through the bitter cold night to neighboring farms, and others still trotted along, singly or in pairs, and were gradually picked up in different localities the day after and returned to the institution. In one instance six male patients were seen crowding around a window in one of the upper stories. They were wonderfully apathetic, and were apparently more interested in the work of the firemen, as a child might be interested in such a spectacle, than in caring for their own safety. They did not appreciate or understand the mortal peril in which they were placed, but jabbered at times among themselves with apparent delight at the spectacle, as if the whole affair were something especially ordered for their entertainment and amusement. At times, as the flames advanced upon them, they would move aside; but only for a moment. Finally, when their retreat had been effectually cut off, some of them seemed to absorb into their dulled intellects a glimmering of the truth, and turned to escape. Then they turned about and addressed a tirade of gibberish to the firemen. In another instant the floor beneath them gave way, and they fell with a chorus of horrid imprecations back into the flames and perished.

The total number of lives lost, as nearly as can be estimated, was thirty-two. The loss on building and furniture was probably $175,000. The burnt portion of the hospital will be reconstructed as soon as possible, and for the present, to relieve the institution of the present overflow of patients, about forty of the more tractable will be distributed among the poor-farms of Ramsey and Hennepin counties, and the hospital for the insane at Rochester, Minn. During and after the fire, the citizens of St. Peter exerted every energy in providing for the unfortunate inmates of the hospital, having converted public school buildings, churches and private residences into temporary hospitals.

The fire seems to have been the work of an incendiary. One Ben Hasselman, an inmate of the Asylum, having been arrested on suspicion, says he was badly treated, and tried to burn the building down in revenge. He says he wished all had been burned. He placed a can of naphtha in the female wing, but it did not ignite when he tried to kindle it. Hasselman was considered a mild case, and was allowed the run of the building.

THE HERDIC COACHES IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE question of cheap transportation in Philadelphia is likely to be solved by the Herdic coaches which have recently been successfully introduced. The street railway system in that city has long been a monopoly. During the last twenty three years, company after company has seized the streets, and so networked them with tracks and so filled them with quick-running cars that pedestrianism in Philadelphia—if walking was an art—has long since been numbered with the lost arts. Now comes the Herdic Transportation Company, with a new sort of vehicle, with which the owners propose to drive out as completely the passenger railway companies as they, in their time, wiped out the old-time omnibuses.

The patent for the new style of coach was issued on the 20th of last April to Peter Herdic, who had recently been relieved of grave financial embarrassments by the United States Court in Bankruptcy. He was without capital, but submitted his patent to some gentlemen, who suggested the utilization of it by the formation of companies for personal transportation, first in Philadelphia and subsequently in other cities and towns, to each of which an exclusive right for the city or town should be granted. In accordance with this, the Herdic Personal Transportation Company of Philadelphia was formed July 30th, and articles of incorporation were granted to it. It has a capital of $250,000, which is divided into 12,500 shares of $20 each. As soon as the company was formed work was begun upon the coaches, and in a short time a number were ready for use. But upon applying to the Chief Commissioner of Highways for license to run their coaches, it was refused, and the company applied to the Court of Common Pleas for a mandamus to compel said Commissioner to grant the privilege asked for. After argument, a decision was given in favor of the company, November 16th, and on the day following thirty coaches commenced regular trips on Broad and Market Streets. Since then thirty more have been started. They run three minutes apart, but this time will be reduced as more coaches are completed and put in operation.

The coaches are of unique construction and attract considerable attention. The body of the coach, which is drawn by one horse, is of square build, and is painted red below and black above. At the front and on a level with the floor of the coach is stationed the driver's seat, large enough to seat comfortably two persons, but intended for the use of the driver alone. A platform about half the width of the body is at the back and extends the entire height of the coach, having a door on each side by which passengers enter and leave. It is probable that this rear platform will be abandoned, having been found to be an incumbrance. The body is placed upon stationary axles, which are about two feet from the ground and twelve to eighteen inches below the hub of the wheel, to which are connected by upright bars of steel, through which runs a second revolving bar, upon which the wheel turns, the axles, which are connected by two square bars of steel, remaining stationary. The rear axle supports the entire weight of the coach, which is built to carry eight passengers and will be considered full when this number are seated within it. The axles and running gear are of steel, tempered and adjusted. The driver of each coach is dressed in a dark suit, with nickel-plated buttons having a monogram of the company. On his hat is a leather band bearing the words, "Herdic Personal Transportation Company," in gilt letters. The fare is placed by passengers in a sort of Rawson box.

The company has made contracts for building a number of two-horse coaches, to seat sixteen people, which will soon be added to its lines. From the success and popularity which the coaches have received at the very outset, it is stated that the whole city will be fully supplied in less than a year, the vehicles running in every quarter where there is a demand for them, and as often as necessary. The fact that the fare is only five cents and that six tickets are sold for a quarter seems to be not the least satisfactory thing about them in the minds of patrons.

What Our Pensioners Cost.

THE Commissioner of Pensions, in his annual report, shows that on June 30th there were 250,802 persons receiving pensions from the Government, the list being composed of army and navy invalids widows, minor children, etc., surviving soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and widows from that war. Eight thousand and forty-seven names have been added to the list since last year. During the year 19,545 new pensions were allowed and 1,377 pensioners previously dropped restored; 12,975 were dropped. The annual pensions average $103.34, an aggregate for all of $25,917,906.60. Exclusive of the arrears, the payments for the year amounted to $27,046,185.89, of which $13,468,191.30 was accrued pension in the new cases. The payments of arrears began in May, 1879. There was paid in May and June of that year $3,033,386.63, and $19,980,808.25 during the last fiscal year. The total amount paid out for pensions during the year was $67,026,994.12. Commissioner Bentley estimates that it will require upward of $50,000,000 to pay the pensions for the current year.

The "Passion Play" Financially.

THE financial statistics of the Ober-Ammergau enterprise show that the gross receipts of the village people for their "Passion Play" amounted to 250,000 marks, or about $62,500. Of this sum 120,000 marks would defray expenses and be devoted to certain communal purposes, and the rest be divided among the players (several hundred in number) according to their class of merit—ten to all. Mayer, who had the chief rôle, got 1,000 marks, not a very extravagant stipend for thirty-nine representations. By far the richest source of revenue, however, to the villagers, was the expensive, if rather pristine, hospitality they extended to visitors.

Petroleum in Russia.

A NEW prospect of commercial activity is dawning upon distressed Russia. The 300 miles of railway connecting the Caspian port of Baku with Tiflis, the capital of the Caucasus, are to be opened for traffic next March. This will at once throw open to the world the splendid petroleum springs of the Baku district, which, though hitherto little used and comparatively unknown, are second to none on the east side of the Atlantic. Many merchants are already in treaty for the best "borer," and the Caucasian railways and Black Sea steamers will amply supply the means of transport. But this relief will come in the burdened Empire not a moment too soon. The sudden coming of Winter, which has frozen up the grain-ships on the Volga, has also prevented the completion of the sowings in Southern Russia, a fact which bodes ill to next year's harvest. The Russian ruble, which has a normal value of 76 cents, has fallen to 48, and this year's budget shows a deficit of fully $36,000,000.

A Grasshopper Jumping Match.

JOHN MACKAY, the mining millionaire, has in his employ at Carson, Nev., an expert named Maurice Hoedich, who always offers to back his opinions by betting. This annoys Mackay, who does not like to be disputed, and is further fretted by the fact that Hoedich usually proves to be in the right. One day Hoedich was playing with an enormous grasshopper. It could jump over twenty feet, and he said, "I'll bet you fifty dollars, Mr. Mackay, dot you can't find a hopper to beat him." The rest of the story, as told by the Appeal, is as follows: Mackay sent a trusted emissary down to Carson Valley to secure a contestant. The man spent nearly a week catching hoppers, and reported that the best gait any of them had was seventeen feet. He doubted if a bigger jumper could be secured. The next day he arrived with about a dozen hoppers, and Mackay gave them quarters in his room as Vanderbilt would stable his stud. Each had a cigar-box to himself, and every morning they were taken out and put through their paces. It was impossible, however, to get one to jump over eighteen feet. Mackay was in despair, but one morning a hopper sniffed at a bottle of ammonia on the table, and immediately jumped thirty feet. Next day Mackay announced to Hoedich that he was ready for the match. The expert came an hour before the time with his pet hopper. Not finding Mackay in, he noticed the bottle of ammonia. A light broke upon him. Grabbing the bottle, he rushed to a drug-store, threw away the ammonia, and ordered it filled with chloroform. Mackay soon arrived with half a dozen mining superintendents whom he had invited to see him have some fun with Hoedich. They were scarcely seated when Hoedich came in with a cigar-box under his arm. "I vas a leetle late, Mr. Mackay, but I'm here mit der hopper and der coin." He laid down the money, which was covered promptly. Mackay got behind somebody and let his hopper sniff at the ammonia-bottle, which held Hoedich's chloroform. Time being called, the hoppers were placed side by side on the plazza, and at the word "Go," each was touched on the back with a straw. Hoedich's entry scored twenty-four feet. Mackay's gave a lazy lurch of some four inches, and, folding its legs, fell fast asleep.

A Formidable Torpedo-ship.

THE Danish torpedo-ship Jordenskjöld, now approaching completion, will be one of the most powerful men-of-war in the North Sea. The vessel is of a very peculiar design, consisting of a turtle-shaped under-ship, with an arched deck armored with three and a half-inch steel plates. The under-ship has a double bottom, and is divided into twenty-three water-tight compartments, in which the boilers and engines are placed, as well as hydraulic machinery for working the exceptionally heavy ordnance with which the ship is to be armed. From this under-ship what may be called a middle-ship arises, the interior of this being divided into forty water-tight compartments, which are filled with cork, to insure the stability of the vessel even after the sides have been pierced by projectiles. Above this middle-ship, or intermediate portion, stands the upper-ship, in which the crew will be berthed in commodious and well-lighted and ventilated between-decks, and the deck-covering, which forms the upper deck of the whole vessel. In the fore part of the upper-ship is a turret, armored with steel plates eight inches thick, in which a 35½ centimetre (14-inch) Krupp gun, weighing forty-six tons and firing a 1,000-pound projectile, will be mounted, while four lighter Krupp guns will be placed elsewhere on the upper deck. The vessel will also carry two torpedo-boats, and will be fitted with apparatus for discharging Whitehead torpedoes above the water-line. Her length is 215 feet, her breadth forty-two feet, draught of water fourteen feet forward and fifteen feet aft, and her displacement 2,400 tons.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Recent scientific exploration of the Lake of Tiberias by Monsieur Lortet has resulted in the discovery of several new forms of fish and new species of mollusks in this celebrated lake.

The Geographical Society of Vienna appeals for subscriptions for an expedition under Emil Holub, which, starting from Cape Colony, will penetrate to Zambesi and endeavor to reach Egypt through Darfur.

M. de Lesseps states that the opening of the Suez Canal has increased the rainfall in the surrounding country to a remarkable extent. Previous to 1859, rain fell only about once a year, while it now falls at least twice a month.

The Pachymeter, lately patented in Vienna, which measures the thickness of paper to the 1,000th part of an inch, is outdone by the micrometer caliper, now coming into use in this country, which determines the thickness of paper, or anything else, to the 10,000th of an inch.

An Important Discovery has just been made at Bath, England, in the shape of a perfect Roman bath, some eighty feet long and forty feet wide, the whole of the interior being lined with lead three-quarters of an inch in thickness; the bath is some thirty feet below the level of the present surface.

From Observations made during nearly twenty years in a forest in the Jura, it appears to be proved that—(1) when light strikes the ground without having been sifted by foliage, it stimulates the production of carbonic acid in the soil; that (2) the growth of wood is diminished when the undebrush is so thick and tall as to impede the passage of sunlight to the soil, and its reflex action on the branches of the trees; and (3) that mold is too great a thickness becomes inert, and thus remains many years, as is the case with farmyard manure when too deeply buried.

The President of the Anthropological Institute of London has attempted an explanation of the long-standing puzzling question of the manner in which the huge and heavy stones which stand as monoliths, or in groups as tombs or temples, were lifted into their places. Some of the hill tribes of India still erect big stones as memorials, and it is reported of one of them that they recently carried a stone weighing twenty tons up a high hill in the course of a few hours. The ponderous block was inclosed in a wooden framework so arranged that a large number of men could lift all at once, and to this simple way it was borne to the hilltop, a height of 4,000 feet.

The "Daily News" Naples correspondent writes that in the excavations commenced a short time ago at Villagrande (Sardinia), there have come to light some instruments which are very remarkable if, as believed by competent persons, they belong to the bronze epoch, which, it is asserted, was exceptionally prolonged in this part of the island. The instruments in question are two bronze saws and a four-pronged fork, all said to have been found in the same repository. Near Taranto, in some new excavations opened in the vicinity of former ones, there have been found twenty-two skeletons, each in its respective tomb, not far below the surface of the ground. The tombs are all dug in the rock, disposed in various positions, and covered with square slabs of stone. Some of them were capable of holding two corpses.

Some of the Most Eminent scientific men now accept the view taken by Adhemar, namely, that continents have not been depressed, but overflowed by the ocean. Owing to the precession of the equinoxes, the mass of water is transferred from one hemisphere to the other in 10,500 years, and the sun remains eight days longer in one hemisphere than in the other. At the present time the Winters of the Southern Pole are eight days longer than with us; the ice continent has consequently formed there, and the mass of the ocean is to be found in the southern hemisphere, and the ice covers a space upon and around the South Pole more than twice the area of Europe. The extreme of cold at the Antarctic Pole was reached about 600 years ago, since which time the climate has been becoming milder, while that north of the Equator has been growing colder.

Some of the German and Russian rail mills employ, it is stated, an ingenious method of overcoming the difficulty of cutting red or nearly white-hot rails, so that they may be all of the same length when cold. According to this plan, the rails are looked at through a dark glass; when they have cooled to a certain temperature, they cannot be perceived; and if, therefore, a dark-blue or an orange yellow glass is used, the rails may still be at a red glow, but the light radiated from them does not reach the eye. It may be considered that the light from two rails, observed through the same dark glass, disappears at the same temperature, and thus a rule is obtained for cooling the rails to the same perfect and identical gauge. In carrying out the method, each rail is allowed to cool until it can no longer be seen through the dark glass, and is then cut. This mode has now been in use for some time with good results.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. J. Q. A. WARD'S model of the statue of General Morgan has gone to Philadelphia to be cast in bronze. The hero of Cowpens is represented standing in a fighting attitude, with a drawn sword in hand. The casting, it is thought, will be finished by February 22d, and the statue is to be unveiled at Spartanburg, S. C., on April 15th.

JAMES L. PUGH, the new Alabama Senator, was born in Georgia sixty-one years ago, and went to Alabama to live when he was four years old. He was left an orphan when eleven years old, and while still a youth he carried a frontier mail two days in the week in order to earn enough to pay his school expenses the rest of the time. He is said to be a man of exceptional ability.

DR. THOMAS WOOD, chief surgeon of the Cincinnati Hospital, has just died from the effects of blood-poison, resulting from his attendance upon the wounded of a recent railway accident in Ohio. Just after the battle of Shiloh, Dr. Wood was of great service in the field and in the hospitals, and at this time lost part of a finger through blood-poisoning, his life being saved with difficulty.

LOUISE MICHEL, the heroine of the Commune, was a handsome woman of twenty-seven when sent to New Caledonia eight or nine years ago. When she returned to Paris the other day, she was a worn and haggard woman, who looked at least fifty years old, and whose raven hair had turned to gray. Her eyes were very dark and sweet, but seemed too habituated to express suffering to look glad.

COLONEL HIRAM FULLER, who thirty years ago was well known in New York as editor of the Evening Mirror, and Naval Storekeeper in the Custom House, died on November 13th in Paris. He had resided principally in Europe during the last twenty years, and had been connected both in London and Paris with several journals which were issued in aid of American interests. He published a volume some years ago descriptive of his European travels.

DESPITE the disturbed condition of Ireland, which gives Queen Victoria so much trouble, the Empress of Austria, relying with reason on her personal popularity there, proposes once more, as she has already done for two years in succession, to take her establishment and sail to Ireland and enjoy a Winter's hunting. As Queen Victoria has not been over-civil to the Empress, it may even gratify her Imperial Majesty's feminine instincts to show herself more at home there than the Queen.

THE first consecration of an Episcopal bishop in St. Louis, and the third west of the Mississippi, took place on November 21st at Christ Church. The new bishop is the Rev. G. K. Dunlap, for some years in charge of Grace Church, at Kirkwood, Mo. He will reside in Santa Fé, his diocese including Arizona and New Mexico. Bishop Whipple of Minnesota conducted the ceremony. The bishop-elect was presented by Bishop Robertson, of Missouri, and Bishop Clarkson, of Nebraska. Bishop Spaulding, of Colorado, preached the ordination sermon. Bishops Burgess, of Quincy; Perry, of Iowa, and Seymour, of Springfield, participated in the services.

SECRETAIRE MADE FROM THE TIMBERS OF THE BRITISH ARCTIC SHIP "RESOLUTE," AND PRESENTED BY QUEEN VICTORIA TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A WRITING-DESK WITH A HISTORY.

ON Tuesday, November 23d, there was received and unpacked, at the White House, a large box, which was found to contain a massive desk or writing-table, a present from Queen Victoria to the President of the United States. It is a magnificent specimen of British handicraft, is elaborately carved out of white oak, and weighs 1,300 pounds. Upon a smooth panel is the following inscription:

"Her Majesty's ship Resolute, forming part of the expedition sent in search of Sir John Franklin, in 1852, was abandoned in latitude 74 degrees 41 minutes, longitude 101 degrees 22 minutes west, on the 15th of May, 1854. She was discovered and extricated in September, 1855, in latitude 67 degrees north, by Captain Buddington, of the United States whaler George Henry. She was purchased, fitted out and sent to England as a gift to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, by the President and people of the United States, as a token of goodwill and friendship. This table was made from her timbers when she was broken up, and is presented by the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland to the President of the United States, as a memorial of the courtesy and loving kindness which dictated the offer of the gift of the Resolute."

The history of the Resolute, the famous Arctic exploring vessel, is full of interest and romance. Originally a merchant vessel, she was purchased by the British Government for Arctic service, and was one of the four vessels which, in May, 1854, Sir E. Belcher, who had been sent out in search of Sir John Franklin, found himself compelled to abandon off Melville Island, the ship being so completely blocked in by the ice that it was deemed impossible for her ever again to be moved. The crew reached home safely with their companions from the other vessels, but the Resolute was looked upon as lost until, in the Summer of the following year, she was discovered off the coast of Labrador by an American whaling vessel, the George Henry, whose captain, Buddington, took her to New London, where, the British Government having abandoned all claims to the vessel, she was bought by order of the American Congress, and, after being thoroughly repaired and equipped, was sent across the Atlantic as a present to Queen Victoria, who went to Southampton to receive the gift in person.

The design for the secretaire is the work of a wood-joiner employed at the dockyard at Chatham, England, where the Resolute was broken up. The top is covered with morocco, bordered and embossed. The front panels contain carved medallion portraits of Her Majesty and the President of the United States; the side panels, Arctic subjects, also in relief; and the space at the back of the table, corresponding with the front panels, is furnished with a set of six drawers on either side, the handles of which are formed by two hands—male and female—grasping each other, symbolic of the goodwill existing between the heads of the two countries. The top cornices of the eight corner pedestals were appropriated to carved representations of the Arctic and Antarctic circles and the American and English flags crossed, while busts of celebrated Arctic explorers support the cornices.

RIGHT HON. W. McARTHUR, LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

RIGHT. HON. W. McARTHUR.

MR. ALDERMAN McARTHUR, M. P., the new Lord Mayor of London, is descended from a Scotch family settled in the North of Ireland, being the eldest son of the late Rev. J. McArthur, a Wesleyan minister, and brother of Mr. Alexander McArthur, M. P. for Leicester. He commenced business in the town of Londonderry, where he became a member of the Corporation, and served on various local boards and institutions. In 1857 he went to London, and since then his business has so prospered that he is now well known, not only as one of the merchant princes of the metropolis, but also as a great philanthropist, and an earnest and energetic politician. In 1867 he served as one of the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and in the following year first entered Parliament as one of the members for the borough of Lambeth (having some three years earlier unsuccessfully contested Pontefract, in the Liberal interest), and was again returned at the general elections of 1874 and this year. His politics are of the advanced order: he takes great interest in the welfare of the working classes, is a supporter of Sir Wilfred Lawson's Permissive Bill, and an active member of the Aborigines' Protection Society. He is also a member of the Reform and City Liberal Clubs, and it is in a great measure to his efforts that Londoners are indebted for the freeing of the Thames bridges from toll. He has also given much attention to Colonial questions, and in 1878, when he made a lengthy visit to Australia, he was received there with every demonstration of welcome. Besides being an Alderman of London and Commissioner of Lieutenancy, he is a Magistrate of Surrey, chairman of the Star Assurance Society, and a director of the City Bank, of the Bank of Australasia and of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, and treasurer of the Surrey Dispensary.

ARCHITECTURAL PROGRESS OF NEW YORK CITY.

THE NEW "HOME" OF GRACE CHURCH.

AN addition to the buildings now standing upon the Grace Church property on Broadway has been recently constructed, which binds the church and rectory edifices together in a tasteful manner. The new building, known as the "Home," is in the latest decorated Gothic style, corresponding to that of the main buildings. Its greatest depth is 64 feet, and its greatest breadth 47 feet. The front is 29 feet, and of white marble, three stories high, with window traceries similar to those of the church. An octagon tower, 61 feet high, breaks the straight lines of the façade. The roof will be of slate. The rear of the structure is two stories high, of marble, with Gothic dormer windows. The first story contains a study for the rector, a vestry-room, a choir-room, and a large storeroom. The second story is divided into rooms for the use of societies of the Church. In the upper story are the sexton's quarters. The stairways are fireproof. There is also a rear entrance from Fourth Avenue through property owned by the Church. The actual cost of construction is set at $27,000.

REV. CHARLES N. SIMS, D. D.

REV. CHARLES N. SIMS, D.D., Chancellor-elect of Syracuse University, was born in Union County, Ind., in 1835. He is the son of a pioneer farmer, and helped to clear the land and earn the purchase money of the homestead. At thirteen he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which his father was a class-leader. At seventeen he began teaching district school in Winter after the Summer farm-work was done, saving his earnings to use in his education. At nineteen he entered the preparatory department of the Indiana Asbury University, from which institution he graduated with the degree of A. B. in 1858. While at college he boarded himself, and earned the means with which to meet his expenses by sawing wood, lighting lamps and teaching classes in term time, and teaching district and village schools during the hot months of the Summer vacations.

Before graduating he was made Principal of the Thorntown (Ind.) Academy, and retained his college class position by studying alone and passing private examinations before the faculty. One year after graduation he received the honorary degree of A. M. from the Ohio Wesleyan University.

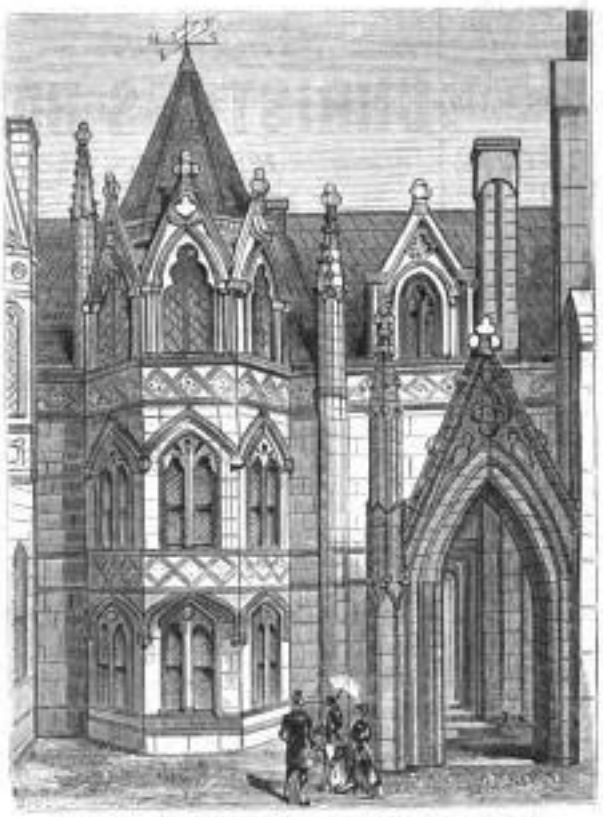
In 1860 he was elected President, and took charge, of the Valparaiso (Ind.) Male and Female College, where he remained for two years; but his health becoming impaired by overwork, he resigned this position in 1862 and entered the field of pastoral work, in which he has continued until the present. He preached in Indiana for eight years, filling the principal stations of his denomination in the cities of Richmond, Wabash, Evansville and Indianapolis. In 1870 he began moving eastward, being stationed successively at Madison Avenue, Baltimore; St. Paul's, Newark, N. J.; Simpson and Summerfield churches in Brooklyn.

He received the degree of D. D. from Asbury University in 1870. In 1875 he was tendered the presidency of the Illinois Wesleyan University, but declined it. In 1879 he wrote "The Life of Rev. T. M. Eddy, D. D.," one of the missionary secretaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which was published by the Methodist Book Concern.

He will remain in charge of Summerfield Church until the close of the present conference year, next April, and will then enter upon the duties of his new position.

Syracuse University, founded in 1870, is the only Methodist University in the State of New York. At the present time it has property and endowment amounting to $500,000, including fine buildings and a campus of fifty acres. Three colleges are in successful operation within the University, viz., Liberal Arts, Medicine and Fine Arts. The latter has courses of study in architecture, music, painting and drawing. There are at present over 300 students in attendance. Its former chancellors were Dr. Alexander Winchell and Bishop E. O. Haven.

THE DISTINGUISHED DEAD IN SCULPTURE.—THE HAMILTON MONUMENT IN CENTRAL PARK.



REV. CHARLES N. SIMS, D.D.—FROM A PHOTO. BY D. GARBER.

THE DISTINGUISHED DEAD IN SCULPTURE.

THE HAMILTON STATUE IN CENTRAL PARK.

THE heroic granite statue of Alexander Hamilton, by Charles Conrads, was unveiled on Monday, November 22d. It is the gift of John C. Hamilton, and is erected on the rising ground on the right of the main eastern drive, to the northwest of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and almost due north of the site of the obelisk. Hamilton is represented standing bareheaded, in the act of speaking, in the costume of Revolutionary days, and wearing on his left breast the badge of the Order of the Cincinnati. In his left hand he holds a roll of manuscript, which lies on the top of a plain, rounded column. His right hand rests in natural action and position in the turn of his waistcoat. The left foot is well advanced, and the weight of the body falls on the right leg. The expressive face, which the donor is well satisfied with, is turned to the right. The sculptor has represented his subject as in his prime. The coat is of the long-tailed, no-collar shape; the shirtfront and wristbands are ruffled, and the high cravat many-folded. Mr. Hamilton wears kneebreeches, silk stockings and low-cut buckle shoes. His hair, which curls off his high forehead, is tied behind in a queue. The pose of the figure is dignified and graceful—that of a gentleman. The action, as the statesman turns to speak, is very natural: it is that of consummate ease of manner, of courtly dignity. One great charm of the work is its simplicity, its lack of incumbering and unnecessary accessories and details. As to the success of the statue as a piece of portraiture there can scarcely be more satisfactory evidence than the statement already made, that the venerable son of the subject, expressed himself as highly pleased with its faithfulness. On the molding, below the die of the granite base, lie on a sash, a sword, its scabbard and a three-cornered hat with a cockade. At the corners below are rosettes in low relief, while along the upper edge of the pedestal are distributed at intervals thirteen stars. The polished inscription on the die is simply "Hamilton," while below are the words, "Presented by John C. Hamilton, 1880." The total height of the statue and its pedestal is about eighteen feet.

MADAME JULIA RIVE-KING.

FOREMOST as a pianiste of extraordinary power stands Madame Julia Rivé-King, with whose charming and artistic performances the American musical public is now happily becoming intimately acquainted. Madame Rive-King, who is a native of Ohio, has been a musician from her cradle, and at the tender age of eight years performed one of Thalberg's difficult morceaux to an astonished and enthusiastic audience. When she reached fifteen she visited Europe, where she studied under the immortal Liszt at Weimar. Her début took place at Leipsig, when she bounded as it were into success. Her first performance in New York created quite a furore, and, with the exception of Rubinstein, never was a pianist received with more earnest enthusiasm. Her touch and tone are full of vigor, and she plays with deep musical insight and feeling, with perfect repose, and entirely from memory. As regards her musical conception and technique and manner, she distances all competitors, while all through her performances runs an indescribable chic, which no artiste, not even in Europe, possesses in common with her. Madame Rivé-King, during the last six years, has performed at over five hundred concerts and recitals. She was the soloist of the New York Philharmonic in the last concert that the late Carl Bergmann conducted, and has since been engaged as soloist at all the principal concerts given by the most distinguished musical societies throughout the Eastern and Western States, amongst which we may mention the Theodore Thomas Concerts, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the Harvard Symphony Concerts, Boston; the University Symphony Concerts, Cambridge; the Peabody Symphony Concerts, Baltimore, etc. Liszt has never found a truer exponent of his "inner melody," and to hear his pupil, Madame Rivé-King, give her brilliant and striking interpretation of his Hungarian fantasie is, indeed, a halting-place "for sweet-sounding memory."

Madame Rivé has invariably chosen a Steinway piano to perform upon. Go to the uttermost ends of the earth, and wherever civilization is at its best, you will find a Steinway piano. It is the dream of all debutantes, the promise exacted from petit-jeunesse for the seventeenth birthday gift, the essential present upon the marriage day! If the Messrs. Steinway did not turn out a super-excellent article, fashion is not so blind as to award it the palm, for musical critics are hard-hitters, and a piano "off color" is worse than a crime; to use Lord Beaconsfield's phrase—it's a mistake. Every leading artist, when about to appear before the public, asks if a Steinway can be had for love or money, and when the small word "Yes" is pronounced, the artist feels that half the victory is gained already. Messrs. Steinway are gold and silver, and bronze and copper medalists. Their pianos have borne off the palm in the well-fought fields of the World's Fairs, and the pre-eminence has been won honestly and on the merits.

The Police of Paris.

ONE whole branch of the police, numbering some 200 employés, is devoted entirely to private investigations and inquiries for families—how to rescue a member from evil courses, how to protect respectable people from scandalous extortion, so commonly practiced under the well-known name of chantage. The Prefecture, as a general rule, knows most things. It is the repository of the secrets of half Paris. Thanks to that indefatigable, painstaking industry which is so marked a characteristic of French official life, and which is especially noticeable in the Prefecture of Police, its personnel has at its disposal a vast mass of information, all admirably indexed and ready for immediate use. These archives, many of which ranged back more than a hundred years, did not survive the fury of the Commune. On the 24th of May, 1871, the Prefecture, with its records, was nearly destroyed. But directly order was re-established, a determined effort was made to build up the whole documentary fabric anew. The task was gigantic, the toil it entailed incessant, and yet it was finished within three years. To reconstitute the casiers judiciaires, each of which is a criminal biography containing a full description of the individual, with all his convictions, it was necessary to ransack the registers of tribunals and prisons throughout France for a period of fifty years. This vast undertaking was, however, successfully accomplished; and, although less complete than the collection they replace, the new archives already meet all requirements, and will soon be as perfect as the old.

THE THEATRES.

OUR theatres are now in full swing, and doing what is vulgarly termed a "roaring business."

"Daniel Rochat," at the Union Square, is drawing large houses, and on its merits. The acting of Mr. Thorne in the title-rôle is deserving of the highest commendation.

Haverly's Fourteenth Street Theatre is nightly crammed by the laughter-loving folk who delight in "Revels."

Haverly's Fifth Avenue Theatre is devoted to the classical, and John McCullough is filling the house by his masterful impersonations of Shakespearean characters.

Haverly's Niblo's Garden indulges the public with the gorgeous dazzle of "Enchantment," which has been reproduced with a magnificence seldom equaled. The dancing of Adèle Cornalba alone is a thing of beauty.

NEW BOOKS.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., the eminent publishers, of Philadelphia, have just issued four works, each more or less remarkable, and possessing an interest all its own. "The Mosaics of Life," in poetry and prose, is a work by Elseth A. Thurston, who has performed her compilation in a truly mosaic manner, blending her ideas with rare ingenuity, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," till the reader loses the outlines, and allows the waves of both poetry and prose to break gently "o'er the crags of the mind." The selection is admirable, while the toning betrays a keen sense of the harmonies of selection. The letter-press and illustrations are all that could be desired. "The Beef Bonanza; Or, How to Get Rich on the Plains," by General James S. Brisbin, U.S.A., is a vivid description of cattle-growing, sheep-farming, horse-raising and dairying in the West. The General, in this graphic volume, shows us that the plains of the West, instead of being barren and worthless as early geographers supposed, have become one of the richest portions of our public domain, while the vast beef resources they contain is the fit subject of this interesting volume before us. General Brisbin gives us chapters on Great Lands and Great Owners; the Money to be Made; the Millions in Beef; "Great Opportunities"; Good Pasture Lands; Montana; Cattle-raising in Colorado, etc., and each chapter bristles with information begotten of a twelve years' residence with three manifold experiences. "Until Ora," a metrical romance, by M. B. M. Toland, author of "Sir Rae." This is a charmingly gotten-up volume of very agreeable poesie. It does not aim at the nice naughtiness of Swinburne, nor yet at the masterful couplets of Tennyson, but the story is told in smooth even verse, exceedingly polished and of good, sound quality. The illustrations are numerous and well executed. "Drifting," by T. Buchanan Read, is a bit of æstheticism, and one that reflects credit on "coltchaw" all round. Imprimis, the covers are "sone poems" in themselves—the silver flower, with its golden centre in the sepia-brown. Then the tinted paper so rich, so creamy so delightful to the eye. Then the letter-press artistic from capital letter to comma, and those wide margins so suggestive of easy-chair reading and dolce far niente. The designs by Miss L. B. Humphrey would reflect lustre upon the pencil of greater in the craft, while the poems are quite in keeping with their æsthetic surroundings.

FUN.

IF Margaret is a "nut brown maid," can she be pet-named nut Meg, for want of a grater?

"AN editor out West was in prison for libelling a justice of the peace, and when he departed the jailer asked him to give the prison a puff."

CHILDHOOD'S INNOCENCE.—Somebody gave little Augustus two toys. "I will give this one to my dear little sister," he said, showing the largest. "Because it is the prettiest?" said the delighted mamma. "No," he replied, without hesitation; "because it's broken."

"BAD cess to it!" exclaimed Mike O'Flaherty, upon learning that Garfield was elected. "Sure, an' now we'll be ruined by Chinese cheap labor." When asked where he worked, Mike replied: "I haven't wrought a shtroke for five years, but me old woman takes in washin', and Garfield wants the hay-then Chinee to take the bread out of our mouths."

A CROSS-EYED passenger got off the Main Central train at Auburn, the other day, whipped out of his pocket a piece of chalk, and marked a good sized white cross on one of the elegant coaches. He then asked his way to the "pump" and filled himself with aqueduct water. When the old gentleman had shuffled back to the train some one asked him why he had put the chalk mark on the car. "My wife told me," said he, "not to git off the train at all for fear I might git in the wrong keers. I thought I'd put a mark on the train so I should know it was the right one."

SOME colored philosopher in the crowd remarked that the telegraph could travel fast. Old uncle Mose spoke up: "Mebbe so, but you can't prove it by dis called witness." Jim Webster replied: "You do sumfin and light out for the interior of de State, and you'll fine out ef de telegraf don't outtrabble yer. I'se had some 'xperience in dat ar telegraf line." "Mebbe so," said old Mose, "but I paid two dollars for a message to my boy Jake, up in Austin, to send twenty dollars. Dat's fourteen years ago, and de money hasn't got hoam yit. Does yer call dat ar quickness?"

"I DON'T believe there's any need of a minister going to college," remarked Mrs. Goodington, in a disputatious mood, the other evening. "A man can preach the doctrine of salvation without a universal education. It is well enough for a physician to have an epidemic training: they need it. But a man can expound the Scriptures without being a college Columbus, as Parson Jones's son calls himself. The old parson was never known to go around talking of his alum water." All saw how fast the good old lady's knitting-needles flew, and all knew it would be idle to take issue with her. Her mind was evidently made up.

WE direct attention to the advertisement in another column of the celebrated YORK COTTAGE ORGANS. They are sold on easy terms and are said to be very popular. The sales of these organs are said to have doubled during the last year.

"USE Redding's Russia Salve."

THE MARCUS WARD & Co. Holiday Cards and New Year's Calendars, advertised in another column, are exquisite in design, coloring, and finish. No higher praise can be given than the fact that they are fully up to the high standard of this house, whose art publications and Royal Irish Linen paper have long been known and unrivaled in every portion of the civilized world.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

IN NERVOUS DISEASES.

W. A. HAMMOND, M. D., late Surgeon-General United States Army, said that, under the use of arsenic and HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE, a young lady recovered her reason, who had been rendered insane by a dream.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS are indorsed by all the leading physicians and chemists, for their purity and wholesomeness. Beware of counterfeits and ask your grocer and druggist for the genuine article, prepared by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

THE pleasure of a stranger in visiting a great city is largely dependent on the hotel where he stops. None can be so unhesitatingly recommended as the ST. NICHOLAS. In the very centre of life and business, superbly kept according to the modern idea of a palatial hotel, every attention is exhausted to subserve the enjoyment of the fastidious guest. The rates have been reduced in accordance with the general tendency of the times.

A SIMPLE trial of DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE convinces the most obstinate of its superior health-giving qualities. It is a perfect Blood Purifier, changes the constitution suffering from general debility into one of vigorous health, and enriches and reddens the blood. Manufactured by its author and sole proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M. D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia. All druggists and dealers in medicines keep it.

THROUGH a number of years the H. W. JOHNS M'F'G Co. have established an enviable reputation for making liquid paints that are remarkable for their durability and beauty. Their ASBESTOS LIQUID PAINTS have real merit, and all who contemplate painting their farm and other buildings should bear this in mind. We can gladly refer the reader to our recommendations of this firm and its paints in the pat.—American Agriculturist, Nov., 1880.

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

AN APPEAL TO COMMON SENSE.

Why is it that, after five thousand years of study and practice, physicians are still unable to cure such common ailments as Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Liver and Kidney troubles?

Common sense convinces one that something must be wrong. Other branches of science, even surgery and dentistry, have achieved wonderful results, while medicine still, remains to a great extent an experiment. Thinking people are exclaiming: Why all these injurious drugs? Why all these large bills, and yet no cure? Surely the doctor ought to relieve me after his five thousand years of profound study. Can it be he is still groping in the dark? Let us take an illustration: Here is an ordinary headache known to the doctor since Adam's time, and yet what physician in Europe or America would or could cure it short of several hours?

Now, if a physician, after all the knowledge his profession has acquired in five thousand years, cannot cure a simple headache, how can he undertake to cure the more serious disorders which affect the human family?

Let us again illustrate: Recently we witnessed a forty days' fast, and the medical teaching of these five thousand years proved positively (?) that the man would surely die unless he observed a most careful diet after the fast; and yet he ate heartily and often everything he desired, and rapidly gained weight, strength and health, while the medical world gazed with open-mouthed wonder and astonishment.

In September, 1878, all London was astonished by a new departure in medicine, a beautiful application of Magno-Electric force, which cured headaches and pennies in two to five minutes (we refer to Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush). The people wondered, the doctors were dumbfounded, while the practical inventor was hailed as a Public Benefactor.

We could fill pages with similar illustrations of the gross errors of medicine, and thinking people are desiring and awaiting a new departure in therapeutics.

One is now in hand, and it threatens before long to revolutionize the old experimental school. It has been conclusively demonstrated in the hospitals of London, as well as in large private practice, that most remarkable cures attend the application of Voltaic Batteries to diseased parts of the body. Persons thought to be dead have been restored, and diseases heretofore baffling the best medical skill have yielded to a remedy which is believed to be the "Vital Spark" itself.

It acts immediately upon the blood, nerves and tissues, generally producing more benefit in a few hours than the doctor has given in weeks or months.

It has been well said, "electricity is the steam in the human engine which keeps it going and regulates its movements. It is the 'Vital Spark,' life itself, pervading all nature with power to kill and to cure."

Our Generator is made to wear upon the affected part. It sends into the body a gentle and continuous galvanic current, which is so regulated as to give not the slightest shock or unpleasant feeling. It can be worn night or day, and will retain its power for several years. Thousands of people are now wearing them with the most gratifying results, and we show our confidence in their merits by promising to return the money if they fail to cure after a reasonable trial.

OUR HOLIDAY NUMBER.

The Double Holiday Number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, which will be issued December 15th, will be especially attractive both in its literary and artistic features. It will contain original stories, appropriate to the season, by Jane G. Austin, J. Esten Cooke, Nugent Robinson, Ella W. Pierce, and other favorite writers; also two original poems; and the illustrations will include two double-page pictures—one entitled, "A Nineteenth Century Christmas in an Old Ladies' Home," and the other, "A Fifteenth Century Christmas Tournament"; "Nuns Dressing up the Crib for Christmas," "The Salutation on Christmas Morn," "The Dream of Sister Agnes," etc. Persons desiring the extra Holiday Number should send in their orders at once. Single copies, 15 cents each.

WHO OWNS THE RAILROADS?

JUDGE BLACK'S letter to the Railroad Transportation Committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce pours a flood of light upon a subject which just now sadly needs illumination. There is no more important issue in the immediate future than that which falls between the people's rights and the interests of those giant corporations that have stretched their iron lines across the continent and into every corner of every State. The gradual building up of railroad monopolies, the consolidation of powerful interests, the slow but steady encroachment upon private rights are insensibly accompanied by a gradual surrender on the part of the people. Resistance weakens as aggression becomes a familiar thing. It is easier to let rights go by default than to maintain them against skilled combinations so much wealthier and more powerful than any one voter. Only when the encroachments proceed to the degree of obvious outrage are the people stirred from their comfortable apathy. Then the result is seldom doubtful.

But before matters get to this point there is need of much clear exposition, such as Judge Black furnishes. How far are the railway corporations the absolute owners of their lines? To what extent do the franchises bestowed by the State Legislatures give them title to the roads which they operate? Are they uncontrollable in the exercise of their vested powers? Can the States interfere when passenger and freight tariffs that appear unreasonable are exacted of customers? What authority is to determine finally between the reasonable and the unreasonable? How shall lines occupying territory in two or several States, holding charters from distinct sources of power, be regulated for the common good?

These are questions which involve abstract principles of law and common justice. The abstract principles are things to which the great majority of citizens, more interested in the practical question of daily bread and butter, are apt to be indifferent. But the daily bread and butter comes in here, too. Every man, woman and child between Maine and Texas is affected by the subject. And to give these men, women and children their bread at a fair price, it is necessary to go to the bottom principles governing the relations of the railroad companies to the sovereign power.

It is the policy of the railroad companies to encourage the theory that they own their lines as a butcher owns his meat-shop, and have the same right to charge their own price for transportation as the butcher has to ask what he pleases for the beef he exposes for sale. Judge Black shows that a railroad laid out and built by State authority for commerce is a public highway, and is not and cannot be private property. The companies holding franchises are merely the agents of the State, intrusted with the performance of a public duty, and allowed to demand a fair profit for the work done. "If the company," he says, "may charge what it pleases, then the road is not a public highway; the public has no right in it at all, and the charter which authorizes the taking of land to build it is unconstitutional and void." As soon as the agents fail in the satisfactory performance of their functions, the State has the right to bring them back to duty and to prevent partiality or extortion. If the State has not this right and power, then the original charters were unconstitutional and are void.

In short, the railroads are public property, in which all citizens have equal rights. They must submit to supervision from the State Governments. If they refuse to submit, they confess themselves trespassers on the public lands, and they may be driven off like any other trespassers. The power of regulation remains with the State Governments. In the case of roads extending over different States, the power is with the Federal Government. A clause of the Constitution of the United States expitcitly provides that the regulation of inter-State commerce shall be in the hands of Congress.

The proposition that the railroads belong to the people, not to the capitalists who furnish the money to buy the iron rails, the wooden sleepers, and the locomotives and other rolling stock, will strike many readers as a startling one. Nevertheless, it is sound, and based not only upon public policy, but also upon common and constitutional law. Of course, the interest of the corporations has been to obscure as much as possible the principles involved. These principles are imperfectly understood by the mass of the people, and they have even been overlooked in judicial decisions. It behooves the people to keep them in view.

Remember, therefore, that although the stockholders have furnished money for construction and equipment, the people, through their Legislatures, have furnished what is much more valuable. The value of the railroad properties does not depend alone on the amount of cash invested. Far more important than the dollars and cents that come from the stockholders' pockets is the franchise that gives the right of way, the right to take lands, the right to monopolize traffic and receive tolls. The franchise is the peoples' investment in the enterprise. It is indispensable to the enterprise, and so long as it is operated, the people who conferred it have the power to see that it is not abused.

The problem which Judge Black has treated so luminously is pressing for settlement. The great trunk lines, vital organs in our national life, are just coming to be controlled by a few monopolists, who gain in arrogance as they find that their grasping policy does not meet with prompt chastisement. The entire railway system is becoming a system of wholesale robbery. Once in a while the growing evil inspires an agitation like that of the Western Grangers a few years ago. That movement was founded on just principles, but it miscarried in its main objects because politicians turned it to their own purposes. Every year there is more and more said in favor of Governments assuming the ownership of the roads, as in Belgium, and operating them as the post-office is operated. That is not the true remedy. The political evils which would attend such a change are sufficiently apparent. We do not want Government railroads. What we do want, and what we can have, is railroads operated by corporations as public agents, and strictly watched and stringently regulated by Government for the benefit of the people.

OUR IMPORTS OF SPECIE.

THE enormous influx of specie from Europe is one of the most interesting features of the financial situation at the present time. Our imports of specie have shown a very large increase within a few weeks, and it is not unlikely that the total for the calendar year will equal eventually that of last year. During the fiscal year ending June 30th our imports of specie—mainly gold—exceeded the exports by $75,891,000; since January 1st they have reached $54,311,844, against $18,592,891 during the same period in 1878, and only $13,206,073 in 1877; and it may be added that $3,000,000 more gold are afloat for this port and due within a week.

As an illustration of the enormous increase in our supply of specie within two years, it may be stated that the estimated amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States now is $454,012,030 in gold and $158,271,327 in silver. In 1860 our exports of specie exceeded the imports by $57,996,000; in 1864 by $92,280,000, and as late as 1875 by $71,231,000; while even for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1879, there was a difference against us of $4,701,000. These figures, it may be explained, include silver. It is worth remembering that the balance in our favor for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1880, was $167,508,359; and another notable fact in regard to our commerce is that for the year alluded to, the value of the imports and exports of merchandise together amounted to no less than $1,503,679,000, or about 80 per cent. more than the trade in 1870, and 120 per cent. in excess of that in 1860.

The present large imports of gold are partly the result of enormous exports of merchandise, and partly of an increasing demand from foreign capitalists for our securities, more especially Government bonds. The drain has been largely from the continent of Europe, and more particularly of late from France; though, of course, the imports from Great Britain have also been large. There is an unusually large amount of idle capital in all the monetary centres of the world, and the increase in the earnings of our railroads, it is pleasing to know, is encouraging capitalists to invest a portion of their funds in this direction as well as in our Government securities. The earnings of our principal railroads for the ten months of this year, ending October 30th, reached the imposing aggregate of $175,933,000, or an increase compared with the corresponding period last year of nearly $38,000,000. These facts naturally encourage legitimate investment in railroad properties; and it should not be forgotten that a large amount of Government securities will fall due the coming year, and that the supply of money to be invested will thus be increased. The growing favor with which our Government and railroad securities are regarded in Europe, together with our large exports of merchandise, and the likelihood that the supply of money seeking investment will be increased rather than diminished, will probably protect the money-market from the manipulations of those who would be glad to produce a stringency. It remains to be seen how the situation will be affected by the fact that the supply of national bank notes is on the decrease, owing to the present high prices of Government bonds. There are alarmists, too, who assert that the large drain of gold from Europe, if it continues much longer, will produce a panic there, which, of course, would injure us; that these enormous importations of specie which are now producing an inflation of our money supply will inevitably lead in the course of a year to a material rise in prices of all kinds of merchandise; that a large falling off in the exports will result, while the importations will correspondingly increase through the abundance of money and a larger demand for European luxuries, and that the two influences will combine to set the stream of gold flowing out instead of in.

These theories represent the other side of the case, and are given for what they are worth. The general feeling is certainly one of hopefulness and confidence.

FRANK LESLIE'S WILL SUSTAINED.

THE will of the late Frank Leslie, which has been contested by two of his sons and one of his grandchildren, was admitted to probate on Thursday last by Surrogate Calvin, in an elaborate opinion covering every point of contest. Mr. Leslie's will bequeathed his entire property, including all his rights in his several publications, and the right to use his name, to his wife, Miriam Florence Leslie, and stipulated that, subject to the obligations of the assignment to the creditors, she should take the place which, in the business of the house, he held at the time of his decease. The probate of the will was resisted by his sons, on the ground that Mr. Leslie was unduly influenced by his wife in executing the document in her favor, and that he was incapable of disposing of his property, being of unsound mind. Abstaining from all comment in the matter, we give below the essential points of the decision of the Surrogate:

The testimony in the case uncontradicted, afforded by the circumstances attending the preparation and execution of the will in 1878, in Mrs. Leslie's absence, the terms thereof, together with the circumstances which accompanied the instructions, the preparation and the execution of the instrument propounded, and its concurrence with his oft-repeated expression of his testamentary purpose, and, above all, the well-attested fact that Mrs. Leslie, even during decedent's last illness, strove to procure interviews for the contestants with their father, and to ameliorate his stubborn dissatisfaction with them on account of their unjust and unfilial treatment of him and his wife, and the general fact that decedent was an independent, self-asserting business man of large and varied experience, who obstinately refused all overtures to bring about a reconciliation between him and the contestants—all concur in establishing the fact in my satisfaction, that the instrument was executed by the decedent when he was free from unlawful influence or restraint.

The only question still left for consideration and determination is whether, at the time when the instrument offered was executed by the decedent, he was of sound and disposing mind and memory, or of unsound mind generally, or by reason of his entertaining an insane delusion as to the conduct of his sons, or as to the obligation he was under to the proponent, his wife.

The two facts which are alleged by the contestants to establish the general mental unsoundness of the decedent are that of late years, after he had given instructions as to the plan of the Paper he would change the plan, and deny that he had given instructions otherwise; and that by one witness the decedent after a severe injury evinced a morbid fear of death, changed color and looked terrified; and upon the assumption of the truth of these two statements experts were of the opinion that they indicated unsoundness of mind. These experts certainly make a very weak case of general mental unsoundness in the absence of any contradictory testimony. But Mr. E. N. Dickerson, who was very intimately acquainted with decedent, who drew the will, as well as a former similar will, and who very often conversed with decedent upon the subject of his business litigations, family relations, and motives for making the will as he did, saw nothing in the decedent indicating any impairment or derangement of his mental faculties, and observed a remarkable calmness on his part when informed that he must die. The testimony of Drs. Thomson and Sims, both eminent in their profession, who had an intimate acquaintance with Mr. Leslie through his last illness, and had ample opportunity to observe all his mental manifestations, observed nothing of an irrational character. The clear testimony of Rev. Dr. Deems to his intelligent coherence and rationality, and his failure to observe anything peculiar or abnormal, though his intercourse with decedent was intimate and his opportunities of knowledge abundant; the testimony of Messrs. Foster and Shea, who for many years had known and associated intimately in continuous business transactions with decedent, understood his methods, explained the necessities and proprieties of his changes of plan and his mode of rebuking those who did inferior work for him, and who observed no change in his mental manifestations up to his last illness, nor in his apt counsel, and the clear intelligence, coherence and prudent forecast and wise counsel to his wife, evinced in his dictation to Mrs. Pierce, and the reasonable inference to be derived from his continued activity in and supervision of the business after the assignment under Mr. England, without any suspicion of his mental or business faculties being impaired—all these present a sufficient array of persuasive proof to overcome any amount of expert testimony, based upon merely hypothetical questions which are so apt to present an exaggerated picture of the person's mental manifestations.

Expert testimony in doubtful cases, if intelligent and unbiased, may be very valuable, but it would be very unsafe except in some exceptional cases to permit such testimony to override that given by intelligent daily observers of the conversations and conduct of those persons whose mental condition shall be under inquiry.

These considerations have led me to the conclusion that the decedent, when he executed the instrument in question, had sufficient capacity to comprehend the amount and condition of his property—the scope and bearing of his will, and that the same is valid, provided he did not entertain an insane delusion as to the conduct of his sons and his duty to them, or as to the claim of his wife upon his bounty.—Delafield vs. Parish, 25 N. Y., 9; Van Guelding vs. Van Reviere, 35 Bl., 70; Tyler vs. Gardner, 35 Id., 59; Kunia vs. Johnson, 50 Barb., 69; Meeker vs. Meeker, 75 Ill., 260.

The delusions upon which the experts' testimony and opinions were taken, and which are claimed to have been of the kind denominated insane, are:

First—That decedent, familiar with the publication business all his life, believed that certain publications were counterfeits, copies, or simulations of his own, when they were not in point of fact.

Second—That the decedent believed that he was arrested in Philadelphia by the procurement of his son Alfred, whereas it was in fact through the exertion of said son that he was released.

Third—That without any cause the decedent turned against and disinherited his sons.

Fourth—That without cause and contrary to the fact the decedent ascribed his misfortunes of a business character to the conduct of his sons.

Fifth—That without cause and contrary to the fact decedent labored under the delusion that his wife had materially contributed to the building up and establishment of his business. The two latter alleged delusions were not made the subject of any hypothetical question to any of the medical experts, nor was their opinion taken thereon.

As to the first alleged delusion, Dr. Kiernan was of the opinion that it was an insane delusion; but on being shown two of the alleged hostile or similar publications, he stated that, while there was a great difference, there was also a similarity, and that he did not consider a man insane because he saw such a similarity. Dr. Milne, upon the assumption that there was no resemblance, copying or simulation, was of the opinion that it was an insane delusion, and Dr. Spitzka was of the same opinion upon the same assumption.

As to the second, Dr. Spitzka was the only expert who gave an opinion that it indicated an insane delusion upon the assumption that there was never any ground for the belief.

As to the third the same expert was of the opinion that it was one symptom of insanity.

In Dew vs. Clark, 1 add., 279, 3 id., 79, Sir John Nicholl defines an insane delusion as follows: "When persons believe things to exist which exist only, or at least in that degree exist only, in their own imagination, and of the non-existence of which neither argument nor proof can convince them, they are of unsound mind. It is only the belief of facts which no rational person would have believed—that is insane delusion."

Judge Redfield, in a note to page 86 of his first volume upon the Law of Wills, says, in commenting upon the case of Clapp vs. Fullerton, 34 N. Y., 190: "This is placing the question upon safe ground, as a belief based upon evidence, however slight, is not delusion, which rests upon no evidence, but upon mere surmise."

Bearing these definitions in mind, I now come to the consideration of each of these delusions in their order.

As regards the alleged similarity of the publications, it should be observed that the occasion of decedent's complaint was that there was such similarity as to deceive, not an expert or non-expert whose attention should be called to the dissimilitude, but the ordinary reading public who should purchase them at the news-stands, and it is quite apparent, whatever his legal remedy may have been, that THEY WERE CALCULATED TO DECEIVE, AND TO SOME EXTENT INTERFERE WITH HIS PUBLICATIONS, AND WHEN THE NAME LESLIE & CO. WAS PRINTED UPON THE COVERS OF TWO OF THEM—THE COPY OF ONE OF DECEDENT'S HEADLINES: "THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD"—PLACED CONSPICUOUSLY AT THE TOP OF THE COVER OF THE ALLEGED SIMULATED PUBLICATION, AND OTHERS ENTITLED FRANK LESLIE, JR., WHEN THE LATTER AT THE SUIT OF HIS FATHER HAD CEASED TO USE THE NAME FOR SEVERAL YEARS, AND RESUMED IT AT A TIME WHEN DECEDENT'S BUSINESS CALAMITIES WERE OPPRESSING HIM, IT MAY WELL BE DOUBTED WHETHER IT NEEDED EVEN AN UNUSUALLY SUSPICIOUS MIND TO REACH THE CONCLUSION THAT NOT ONLY THAT THEY WERE CALCULATED TO DECEIVE, BUT THAT THEY WERE SO INTENDED.

When it is conceded that Alfred Leslie, without legal necessity, went to Philadelphia and testified to facts sufficient to convict the decedent of a criminal libel, it must be perfectly apparent that the suspicion of his father that he was instrumental in procuring the arrest made under the circumstances, was based upon quite satisfactory evidence, and that his information that Alfred was instrumental in procuring his release, at the humiliating cost of a published retraction, raised no doubt in his mind of the justice of his suspicions.

So far as the third alleged delusion is concerned, the publications referred to, the litigations respecting Henry's name, the affidavits made by each of the sons, and the conduct of Alfred as a witness in the Roberts case, and the general attitude of the sons, afford at least some ground for the decedent's allegation that his sons had deserted him in his business calamity, though it may not have been sufficient to warrant the conclusion of an unprejudiced mind.

Regarding the fourth alleged delusion, the relation of the parties, the alleged desertion of both of his sons immediately after his departure for Europe, the outside publication, the absence of Alfred at the time of his assignment, and the predication of business, were matters which, while they may not justify the charge in substantial degree, yet afforded a plausible excuse for a failure, which evidently was both humiliating and distressing to him, and whether he believed the charge, or used it as a cover, it cannot be held to be an insane delusion.

As to the fifth and last, though the contestants did not deem it necessary to take the opinion of either of the experts, yet considerable testimony was given calculated to belittle the alleged services of the proponent rendered in decedent's business, but a fair consideration of the testimony on both sides leaves no doubt that she did occupy a position of considerable activity and prominence in the supervision of some of the publications, of contributor and critic to others, and of general adviser with decedent and his subordinates.

It is possible and probable that he may have, and did, put an exaggerated estimate upon the value of those services—not a very unusual thing for affectionate and generous husbands to do, but which it would be very absurd and irrational to ascribe to an insane husband.

I should not have deemed it necessary to have discussed at length the questions of insane delusions but for the proof that decedent had at one time made a will providing equally for his wife and his sons, and the repeated statements of the decedent of the reasons why he made the will as he did, for I am not prepared to hold that, considering the amount and complications of decedent's property, and that his sons were men of mature business experience and capacity, it is an undutiful will.

In the foregoing discussion I have not ignored the fact that it is claimed by the contestants that insanity in the decedent's family was hereditary. But that fact, useful for the purpose of accounting for strange and extraordinary conduct, has no application to a case where a person's mental manifestations afford no suggestion of mental unsoundness, for it is his, and not his ancestors' mental condition which is under consideration and the subject of inquiry.

I am of the opinion that the instrument propounded, was duly executed conformable to the requirements of our statute for the execution of last wills and testaments by the decedent when he was of sound and disposing mind and free from restraint, and that the same should be admitted to probate.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE dullness which reigns in English politics during the recess of Parliament has recently been somewhat disturbed by the Marquis of Salisbury. His lordship, who was Foreign Secretary under Lord Beaconsfield's last administration, delivered a speech at Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, which is attracting universal attention. He severely attacked the the policy of Mr. Gladstone's Government, as well upon foreign as upon home affairs. It is thought likely that the present Cabinet will be forced to make some reply to his strictures, for he charged Mr. Gladstone not only with incapacity, but with duplicity and treachery. As regards the Irish policy of Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury was very emphatic. He traced all the present trouble to the temporizing legislation of the Liberals in 1870, and pointed out that no land reforms would satisfy the Irish. What the Land Leaguers really want is a separation from England. A proprietary peasantry will prove no panacea for Ireland's woes; if that were granted, some other demand would at once be made, and the Government would be met with fresh difficulties. Therefore, Lord Salisbury, who may be considered the mouthpiece of the Conservative Party, thinks that the only true policy is one of coercion. As this is the popular sentiment in England, it is quite possible that the Ministry may find themselves in a very unpleasant position when Parliament reassembles. Of course, they have an overwhelming majority, but the very magnitude of their majority may prove a source of weakness, as it may be split up into different factions.

The financial condition of Austro-Hungary has long been unsatisfactory. For more than a century there has been a deficit in the budget. The country has been becoming more and more heavily weighted with debt. The estimates for the coming year have lately been presented in the Reichsrath, and the estimated deficiency is $17,000,000. The nature of the Austro-Hungarian Empire—a mixture of German and Slavonic elements—necessitates a large expenditure, for one-half of the population have to be overawed by the other half. So it comes that the annual expenses of the Government are $250,000,000, and that the taxes are insufficient to provide that amount. The Government has a monopoly of the tobacco, and controls the railroads and telegraph. The imposts are numerous and onerous, and there is a State lottery. The Minister of Finance now proposes the imposition of a tax upon petroleum and some other articles of common use.

In Germany the persecution of the Jews is on the increase. The most bitter feeling exists towards that long suffering race, and the subject will soon be discussed in the Prussian Lower House. The most remarkable feature of the anti-Jewish crusade is the number of prominent men who have entered into it. At the present day, one would think that any attempt to revive the hostile feeling of the Middle Ages against the Jews would be at once frowned down by men of position and education. Such a persecution seems to be altogether opposed to the very spirit of the nineteenth century. But in Germany this is not so. The leader of the movement is the Rev. Herr Stoecker, the court chaplain, and it is supposed that the Emperor himself is in favor of some measure against the Hebrews. A petition addressed to Prince Bismarck is being circulated for signatures. It asks the Prince to exert his influence in Germany and Prussia to prevent or moderate the immigration of foreign Jews; to exclude them from offices of authority, especially from a judicial and legal career; to shut them out from the field of education, and to collect full statistics of the Hebrew population. Several assaults have been made upon Jews, but their persecutors have not always come out of the fray victorious. At the same time, there is a counter movement, and many well known literary men, such as Professors Mommsen and Virchow, are protesting in strong language against any revival of the "race-hatred and anti-Jewish fanaticism of the Middle Ages."

In the Italian Chamber of Deputies a vote of confidence in the Cairoli-Depretis Cabinet has been passed by 221 to 188. This is a very remarkable result, and is quite unexpected. The composition of the present Government is curious. Cairoli, the Prime Minister, was a fiery Garibaldian, while most of his Ministers are men who stuck to the old Bourbon régime until the last moment. The more radical element in the Chambers is naturally hostile to the Ministry, for Cairoli has, to a great extent, given up his former ultra-liberal opinions. At least, he believes that Garibaldi did all that was necessary, and that any further agitation is not only useless but would prove injurous to Italy. That Cairoli should receive so large a vote is consequently remarkable.

ONE hundred and four members of the present House of Representatives will not respond to the roll-call of the Forty-seventh Congress. The latest statement of the results of the recent Congressional elections give 147 straight Republicans against 146 members of all other sorts, a majority of one. The Republicans count also six Independents and Greenbackers as sure to act with them, giving 153 votes for the organization of the next House, against 140 Democrats, assuming that Ladd and Murch of Maine and Jones of Texas will act with the Democrats.

THERE is a possibility that the Chinese Government will demand indemnity for the losses sustained by the Chinese in Denver in the recent assault upon them by a murderous mob. The Chinese Consul at San Francisco has been inquiring into the facts in the case, and the evidence he has gathered which is said to be very complete, will be made the basis of the demand upon our Government for indemnification. The Consul argues that his Government, in paying over to the United States the sum of $700,000 to indemnify American citizens for losses sustained during riots in China, has set us an example which we cannot afford to disregard.

THE failure of the Georgia Electoral College to meet in conformity with law, on Wednesday last, shows again how very easily the will of the people might be nullified in the election of a President. It appears that the Governor of the State called the college together in pursuance of some old State law, and in disregard of the Federal law, fixing the first Wednesday in December as the uniform day for the meeting of Electors all over the Union; and the result is that, if the law shall be adhered to, the vote of Georgia will be lost to the Democrats. The action of the Governor is condemned by very many citizens of the State as inexcusably careless, and this sentiment will be intensified should the vote of the State, when finally sent to Washington, actually fail to be counted.

SOMETHING like a genuine reform movement has been started in Philadelphia by the better class of Republican citizens, who desire to put an end to the "Ring" rule which has of late years afflicted the city. A committee of one hundred prominent merchants, manufacturers and business men has been formed, and it is proposed to reconstruct the legislative department of the city administration on a basis of genuine sympathy with reform ideas, to the end that existing abuses, now and heretofore sheltered by that department, may be either entirely exterminated or greatly abridged in their influence. The trouble in Philadelphia, as in many other large cities, is that men of high character and acknowledged integrity are excluded from the public administration by the pressure and audacity of self-reaching demagogues, and there can be no real cure of the evils of misrule until the people take the matter honestly and vigorously in hand, and make the public interest paramount, in their political action, to all mere partisan considerations.

THE Woman's National Christian Temperance Union has issued an appeal for subscriptions to a fund to procure a testimonial in honor of Mrs. Hayes for her resolute stand, as hostess of the White House, in favor of total abstinence. This testimonial is to take a two-fold form. First, it is proposed that a life-size portrait of Mrs. Hayes shall be painted for the White House, by one of our best artists, with such accessories and inscriptions as will give it the significance required; and secondly, it is intended, should the subscriptions attain the proportions expected, to apply the surplus, after paying for the picture, as the nucleus of a fund, the interest of which shall be used in procuring and circulating total abstinence literature. An engraving of the portrait will be sent to every person who contributes five dollars to the testimonial, and it is hoped to raise at least $10,000 for the fund. If every admirer of Mrs. Hayes's character and life shall contribute, even meagerly, to this fund, the total must greatly exceed the amount named as a minimum in the circular of the Woman's Association.

IT has been generally believed that the adulteration of food has become an enormous evil in this country; but if the conclusions of a certain committee appointed by the National Board of Trade to look into the subject are to be relied upon, this belief is not sustained by facts. This committee, grouping the opinions of various essayists who have investigated the subject, under the stimulus of a prize of $1,000 for the most satisfactory essay, says that none of the writers produce any definite or satisfactory evidence as to the widespread existence of very dangerous adulterations in this country. Such dangerous adulterations appear to be mainly in the form of poisonous colors or coloring matters—as, for instance, in confectionery, and even these are rare. The question of the adulteration of food—with, perhaps, the exception of milk—should therefore be considered not so much from a sanitary standpoint as from that of commercial interests, as being in the nature of a fraud, in aiding the sale of articles which are not what they are represented to be. The committee is of the opinion that there is much more danger to health and life in this country from adulterated drugs than from adulterated food, and that any legislation which is to deal with the one should also deal with the other. A Board of Health is recommended for each State, and both State and National legislation on the subject of adulteration is deemed desirable.

IT is said that the fisheries question is moving towards a solution satisfactory to this country, and which will not call for the interference of Congress, or the abrogation in any particular of the Washington Treaty. From the statements made by an official of the State Department, it is concluded that Lord Granville, the present British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, will not assume, as was done by his predecessor, that the stipulations of the Washington Treaty can be controlled by local legislation, and as this is the main point of difference between the two countries, there is no reason why the victims of the Fortune Bay outrage should not be compensated by Great Britain instead of by this country. It is certain that one Government or the other must award them compensation for the losses incurred while exercising their rights under the treaty.

IT is now announced that two treaties have been negotiated with China by the American Commissioners—one relating mainly to the question of immigration and the other to commercial matters. It is understood that the first remits the control of the terms upon which Chinamen may enter and settle in this country almost entirely to the United States, and in return for this concession our Commissioners have granted certain important commercial privileges, one of which is that hereafter Chinese shipping will be placed on the same footing as that of the most favored nations. It is stated that the Chinese authorities, never really favorable to the emigration of its citizens in large numbers to any country, are now exerting an active influence through the consular officer in Havana to check any further emigration of Chinese labor to the South. The efforts made for some time past by the sugar planters in Louisiana to import Chinese labor from Cuba appear to have already failed, owing to the opposition of Chinese consuls. It is believed that the new treaty of commerce with China will give a great impetus to the trade between the two countries.

A NUMBER of the city newspapers are calling attention to the extravagant expenditures of our city government and the necessity of reform in that particular. The Tribune shows, as the result of an examination of the official records for the last twenty years, that while in that time the population has increased from a little more than 800,000 in 1860 to 1,206,577 in 1880, the total of city appropriations has risen from about $10,000,000 to $28,167,992. Thus, while the population has grown one-half the expenditure has increased at a three-fold rate. The estimates for next year are much larger than the appropriations for this year, amounting to more than $30,000,000, and unless there shall be a sharp retrenchment, the burdens of the taxpayers will be increased rather than diminished. Is it not time that the great body of taxpayers—the men who have a small as well as those who have a large interest in economical government—should take hold of this matter, and see if something cannot be done to get the city government down to solid business principles? There is not a department of city affairs which cannot be run more cheaply than it is, and it is criminal waste to permit the extravagance in expenditure to go on without any real, honest effort to stop it.

THE Superintendent of the Census, General Walker, reports that the work assigned him is substantially complete, and that during the present month tables will be submitted exhibiting the population of each State and county in the United States, distinguished as native or foreign, white or colored, male or female. The full report will embrace, in addition to the features originally provided for, statistics of wealth, debt and taxation, and of churches, schools and libraries; social and industrial statistics of the Indian tribes; population, industry and resources of Alaska; statistics of newspapers and periodicals, and of the book-publishing interests, of the tobacco culture, chemical manufacturing industries, ship-building, petroleum production, the quarrying industry, and the factory system. The authority conferred by the Census law for the appointment of special agents to collect the manufacturing statistics of cities and large towns has been made use of to the extent of appointing such agents in 276 cities and towns, the total number of agents appointed being 365. From 200 of these cities and towns full returns have been already received, and an examination of the schedules shows that the value of the manufacturing statistics of the present census has been vastly enhanced by the system thus adopted. All the returns within this department of the census will, it is believed, be in possession of the office during the present month, when the compilation of the manufacturing statistics will be pushed rapidly forward. The accounts of 28,410 enumerators have already been settled, involving a total expenditure of upward of $1,820,000.

REV. WILLIAM C. CATTELL, D.D., PRESIDENT OF LAFAYETTE COLLEGE, EASTON, PA.

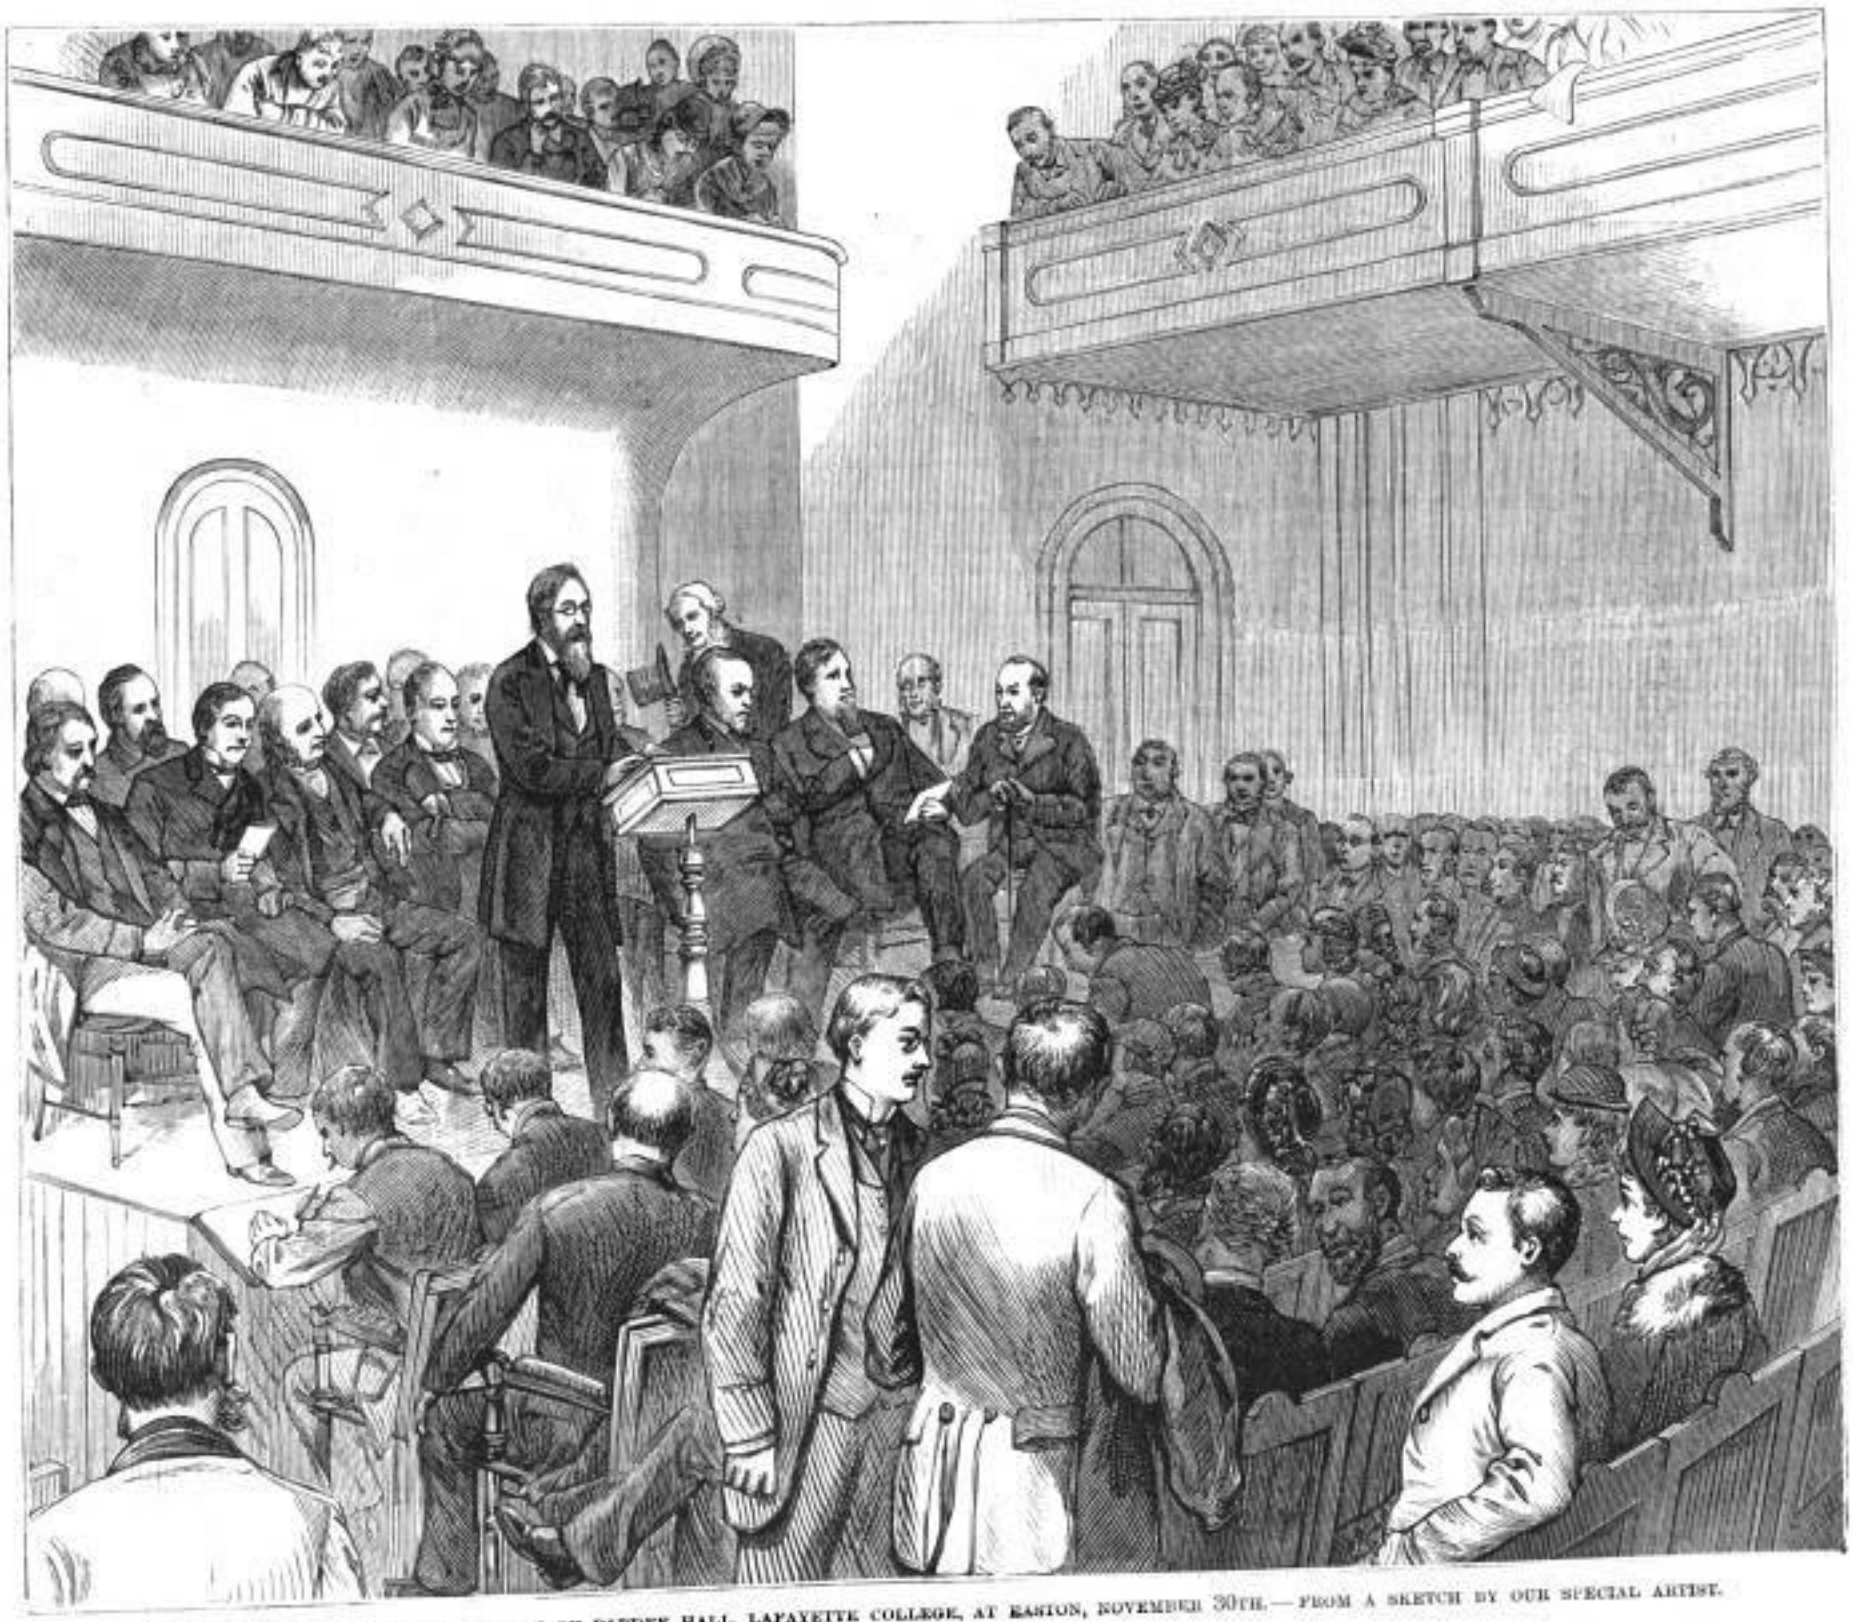
ARIO PARDEE, FOUNDER OF PARDEE HALL, LAFAYETTE COLLEGE, EASTON, PA.

THE RE-DEDICATION OF PARDEE HALL,

LAFAYETTE COLLEGE, AT EASTON, PA.

WHEN the stately Pardee Hall, which was dedicated in 1873, was destroyed by fire in 1879, the loss to Lafayette College was not the crushing blow that it would have been if the Trustees had neglected to insure. The building has now arisen from its ashes and stands as before, its exterior so closely resembling that of the former building as to lead to the impression that there had been no fire. The insurance money was found ample for purposes of rebuilding. The Hall was originally the gift of Mr. Ario Pardee, of Hazleton, Pa., a gentleman whose ample fortune has resulted from hard work and diligent attention to business. Mr. Pardee's first gift to Lafayette College was $20,000, which he has increased at various times, till the sum of his beneficences now reaches half a million dollars. He is a plain and unostentatious man, not given to speech-making, but fond of the quiet actions of benevolence which speak louder than words.

The persistent perseverance of the Rev. Dr. Cattell, the President of the College, has resulted in the gathering of about a million dollars since 1864. This has brought the institution up from a condition of poverty to the present proud position it occupies. There is yet a considerable amount of work to be done in placing some of the professorships on a more substantial pecuniary basis than they now enjoy; but with what has been done in the past for Lafayette there is good reason to hope for the consummation of the hopes of its best friends.



The resurrected Pardee Hall was dedicated on Tuesday, November 30th, which was a day of great rejoicing in Easton and on the college hill. The great event of the day was the arrival of President Hayes and his party, and long before half past ten, when the train was expected in Phillipsburg, crowds had gathered about the public square, along North Third Street and around the depot. When President Hayes stepped off the car, cheers arose from the crowd and all the bells began to ring. In front of the carriages proceeded a large omnibus, filled with a party of clergymen and others, who had come on a special train from Philadelphia. Among them were Rev. N. S. McFetridge, Rev. Dr. E. P. Cowan, Rev. Dr. Muchmore, Rev. Loyal T. Graham, ex-Senator A. G. Cattell, of New Jersey, Rev. Dr. Dunn, Rev. Dr. Dickey, John H. Atwood, Professor W. H. Green and Professor James C. Moffatt, of Princeton.

When the chapel was reached the party alighted and walked to the new Pardee Hall. There they ascended the steps and stood facing the audience. President Hayes stood in the centre, surrounded by Ario Pardee, the benefactor of the college; Dr. Cattell, General R. E. Patterson, of Philadelphia; General Sherman, John I. Blair, of New Jersey, and William E. Dodge, of New York. President Cattell said he had tried to get Mr. Pardee to talk, but it always had been easier to get $100,000 from Mr. Pardee than a speech. Governor Hoyt was then introduced, and, among other things, said:

"Lafayette is certainly having its full share of days, many of them red-letter days. They have a courageous philosophy here, born of a cheerful kind of adversity, a chastening kind of prosperity, a sort of jugglery with bricks and brick-dust. Only a few months ago the sightly structure disappeared, now this graceful one fills the heavens. Pardee Hall is a new pledge that it will so equip the colleges that their worst work of to-morrow will equal the best work of yesterday."

The appearance of the President was the sign for prolonged applause. He said:

"Mr. President, Governor, Ladies and Gentlemen: In our country, as in every Republic, it is the business of the Government to educate its citizens in the duty of citizenship. Indeed, the government of this country is in the citizens, and it will be a good government just in proportion as the citizens have a good education. The best government in a Republic will be that with the best education. Ignorant voters are powder and ball for the demagogue; therefore it is that from the beginning Washington, Jefferson and the fathers, all, urged on every suitable occasion the importance of popular education. But there is something beyond this—beyond that which is necessary merely to make good citizens. There is that higher education which can be furnished only by the college, the university, scientific school, and those institutions our Government does not in any large degree aid. The exceptional cases are West Point and the Naval Academy, but for the rest, that higher education which every people should have, we must look to the beneficence, the voluntary contributions, of the wealthy citizen who has the generosity to found institutions like this: men who understand that in no way can they do such good to those who come after them and build monuments for themselves as by endowing the colleges, universities and scientific schools. Therefore, we are here to do honor to the man who has set the example, and what an example it is! He does not wait until his last will and testament, and those things the lawyers around me understand. He does it while he is alive. Let us say we are spending our time well to-day in honoring this example. I thank the president and trustees of the institution for the institution, and am glad to be here. Let us say, 'God bless it.'"

The address of Professor F. A. March, Professor of Comparative Philology, was the principal feature of the dedicatory exercises in the auditorium. He spoke on "the building and apparatus of a modern college."

He began with the east wings of the hall, which contain the laboratories in mechanics and physics and the rooms for drawing and office work in civil engineering. These led to a discussion of the use of manipulation in education. It is a gymnastic of the mind and hands and eyes. It quickens the memory, strengthens the judgment and stimulates invention. The west wings contain cabinets and collections in mineralogy, botany, natural history and geology. These led to a discussion of the study of the classificatory sciences. It gives a knowledge of all natural objects in their relations to each other, so that we can tell where to find our coal and iron and gold. In the central part are the libraries, lecture-rooms for history, political philosophy and language, society halls and the grand auditorium. These are apparatus for the study of man and for training in speech. This must always be the main work in education. Knowledge is built so high that we have to stand on the shoulders of former thinkers. To make noble modern men we must study noble modern thought. We must study modern languages, English most of all. The general structure of the building was compared with that of ancient college halls. The old hives of cells, dimly lighted and poorly warmed and ventilated, are sorry places in comparison with these large and lightsome rooms. The old halls have their beauty of association. By-and-by this hall will rival them. None had a nobler association to begin with than that of our hall with Ario Pardee.

After a liberal collation, which was furnished by the ladies and eaten by the gentleman, two hours were pleasantly spent in "after-dinner speeches," one of which, that of Mr. John I. Blair, was seasoned with a gift to the college of $10,000. The whole proceedings were exceedingly felicitous. President Cattell was never more in his element than among the army of friends with whom he found himself surrounded. The rich men were on hand, and one of them made a ten-thousand-dollar speech, which is expected to lead to a harvest of forty thousand dollars more to make an endowment for the presidency. Lafayette has made proof of its ability to make wise use of the money committed to its care, and Dr. Cattell has become so used to asking rich men for large sums and getting what he asks, that he will scarcely know what to do when all the wants of the college shall be supplied.

THE MAJOR'S MARRIAGE.

MY wife always says it was my fault! Well, what it it was? The major might have done a great deal worse. Being such an unbusiness-like sort of fellow, it's a wonder that he didn't do worse. He has his father to thank for that, as well as for some other things.

I am a solid man in more senses than one; there ain't many weightier, as far as money goes, in the Western city I hail from. I've always had a good appetite and a better digestion ever since I first came to the shore of the great lake, a barefoot boy with ten cents in my pocket. So, while the ten cents have been growing into millions, I haven't grown thin, and I don't mean to pretend that I am anywhere near as active at seventy two as I was at twenty-two. I stick by facts, and I suppose I did come down rather heavy from that omnibus-step.

It had snowed and rained for a week—hard. Now everybody knows what the streets in Chicago are capable of under such circumstances. It isn't quite so bad as in the time old settlers tell you about, when a loaded team went down into the earth in front of the court-house and disappeared for ever. No; candidly, the streets are improved since then; but, naturally, water on ground as level as a table-top will stand in huge puddles when that ground is soaked, and the traffic of a city passing through such puddles rolls them a considerable quantity. The North side omnibus stopped right on the edge of one of these horrible lakes, and I had to jump it. I suppose I might have called to the driver to go on, but I've never looked out much for other people to wait on me; my way is to go ahead myself. So I went ahead and landed all right, but somehow or other my leap shook the old stage tremendously, and the horses started off. I heard a slight shriek and turned round just in time to see a girl, who must have been coming out behind me, tossed off the high step, like a feather, into the mud. I was so scared that the only thing I could think of was to roar at the driver and threaten him with State's prison: but he was Dutch, and didn't either understand or didn't care. But the girl was as quick and light as a cat, had fallen on her feet and was picking up a roll of music out of the black water.

"Oh, dear, dear!" she was saying to herself when I got to her, in a shaky kind of voice, as if she was ready to cry.

"Are you hurt?" I asked her, pretty sharp, but she didn't answer me; just stood and looked at her music, and her shoes, and her gloves, and her daubed dress-skirt, and then put out a foot plastered with mud up to the ankle so that you couldn't see the shoe at all, and looked at it. "Oh, what shall I do?" she said, and then she realized at last that some one was speaking to her, and she looked up at me with black, soft, childish-looking eyes, full of tears. There was a lamp close by, so I could see her quite plain. It was about seven or half-past in the evening, and two days before Christmas. I had been looking up some presents for my grandchildren, Margaret's boy and girl; they have their tree at the old place, and my wife makes a mighty fuss about it. The State Street shops were so crowded that it was pretty hard on a stout old party like me—in fact, it was as much as a man's life was worth—to get near the counters at all, generally speaking; but they knew me at most of them—but to return to my young woman.

"I am sure you are hurt," I said to her. "Wait, I will get a carriage to take you home."

"Oh, no, indeed," she replied, in a hurry. "I am not hurt—I do not want a carriage." But while she spoke two teardrops rolled down her cheeks, and she held the skirt of her dress out between her thumb and finger, and looked at it again. It was heavy with mud.

"Well, then, what are you crying about?" asked I, a little out of patience at being scared for nothing, but not really cross, for her eyes had the look of Baby Maggie's when she is grieved, and some women are just fools enough to cry over spoiled clothes—they can't help it.

"Oh!" said she, "I had an engagement to play for dancing, and I need the money terribly. I cannot go in this state, and I have no time to wash my dress. Oh, dear, I must go back home!"

I looked at her steadily one minute, but she didn't notice me any more, she was watching for a down-town stage. Her story might be true, for her face was thin and white—one of those round faces that ought be plump—and her babyish eyes were larger than they had a right to be.

"Never mind," said I, all of a sudden, "you shall keep your engagement—you see if you don't. Where is it?" I added, to make things as straight as possible.

"At Mrs. Starr's, 94 Dearborn Avenue," she answered, quite simply.

"I know her well," says I.

"She is very particular," said the girl. "I couldn't go to her house like this."

"No," says I, "but look here. In that next block, across the street, is a nice little shop, where you can get the mud all cleaned off. Come on, I'll show it to you."

She hesitated, looked at me and looked up the street doubtfully.

"Come on," said I. "It's only a few steps, and I'm in a hurry."

Well, she went with me to the little cleaning and repairing establishment. I knew the people, and that they would do well by her: in fact, I had helped Christine Hanson along when her husband broke his leg in my lumber-yard, and she was a grateful woman. I explained to Mrs. Hanson how it was that I had accidentally jostled a young lady from the omnibus-step into the mud, and requested her to exert herself. Christine was ready to serve me, and promised to turn the young lady out as good as new in twenty minutes, all but her shoes.

"Those are too bad," she said, shaking her head.

"Send in to the nearest shop for some more," said I, taking out my purse; "and get some clean copies of this music." But the girl started up from the chair by the counter.

"No—oh, no, sir," she said. "Thank you—I cannot."

"Madam," said I, "I have been the means of spoiling your shoes, and I have a right to make compensation for your loss."

"It is out of the question, sir," she answered, very gently; but gentle as she was, I couldn't stir her one inch. I was quite at the end of my arguments when Mrs. Hanson, a very sensible woman, struck in:

"Borrow de money, miss. Mr. Prentiss is so good, he vill vait long."

The young woman looked more hopefully on this proposal.

"But I am afraid I shall never pay it," she murmured; "unless you should happen to want music for a little dance some time—I play either harp or piano."

"I do," said I—"that settles it all." And I engaged her at once to come the next evening to my house—we always have a small gathering on Christmas Eve—handed her a ten-dollar bill, and was going off in some haste, when she laid her hand on my arm to stop me.

"It is too much, sir; I only want five dollars," she said.

Then I got enraged.

"Young lady," I said, "I am not used to being stirred up and contradicted, and refused the privilege of making up pecuniary losses. I have always passed for an honest man. You ask any man in the city what Peter Prentiss's reputation is. I have been poor myself, but I never was so proud as to be unfair to other people. Good-evening;" and so I shut the door in her face and left her.

I walked home from Clark Street pretty fast, for it was snowing again, and my house is some little distance. A tremendous west wind had risen, and come tearing over the city right from the Rocky Mountains: it was enough to chill the blood in a man's veins. I declare when I opened the door at home with my latchkey, and felt the glow inside, and saw through the open door the bright room where my wife and Margaret sat making their things for the tree, I couldn't help thinking of that girl I had just left, going about the city alone in her thin "water-proof"—and plenty of other woman like her, and even worse off—and a great shiver went over me as I hung up my overcoat. I told my wife and Margaret all about it, and while I was in the middle of my story the major came into the room and I had to begin it again. Margaret laughed and chaffed me a good deal. "I don't really think that it was I who threw the young woman off the steps. It was the stupid driver who didn't know she was getting down, and started his horses when he heard me jump."

The major was in full swallow-tail, and said he was going to Mrs. Starr's and would observe if my protégé arrived there. My son, the major, is good looking and a good fellow—a fine, manly fellow—and I'm proud of him. But he's a very different kind of man from his father; and if his father had been able to do no more for him than my father did for me, I don't know as the major would have got along as well as I did: for he's romantic—was always mooning about over poetry-books when a boy, couldn't be made to take any interest in lumber as he grew up, which was a pity; but I got over it. When the war broke out, he blazed up into a fury of patriotism and enlisted at nineteen, fought the war through, came home and settled down steady to romance, wrote poems in magazines and mooned worse than ever. He attended a little to the business to please me, and he went into society with his sister, but never cared for either business or pleasure. After Margaret got married he went out as seldom as he could, and never seemed to have the faintest idea of bringing us a daughter-in-law to take Margaret's place, though he was getting on in life. Still, I don't mean to say I was dissatisfied with my major. He was a good son and a gentleman, and if he had his fancies—why, he could afford to have them.

"Well, Elliot," said I, next morning at breakfast, "was the young woman there all right?"

"I think so," he answered, rather slowly, as if he wasn't sure of anything, looking into his coffee-cup and stirring it moonily: "there was a young girl dressed in black, who played the harp. She looked very tired and sad. I wondered if the other girls who were dancing saw her and felt the difference?"

"I wonder you didn't ask her to dance, El, my boy," said I. "It would have been quite in your line."

The major smiled faintly; he didn't appreciate my little joke, and my wife remarked very sensibly, that the girl being paid for her time, of course, preferred to earn her money, and was probably contented with her position. Nothing more was said on the subject, and I forgot all about my protégée as they called her.

But when I came home at night there she sat in the hall patiently waiting. I believe I told her to come early on account of the children. When she saw me she got up and came rather timidly to speak to me.

"I am afraid, sir," said she, "that I offended you last evening. I beg you to excuse it, and to let me thank you for your goodness to a poor stranger."

"It's all right," said I, trying to make her feel comfortable. "I couldn't well do any less after causing the accident."

She was a little thing, come to notice her, and all in black. She looked so small and forlorn and strange in the big hall, that I showed her into the parlor myself, and asked her if she didn't want to see if the harp was in tune.

While the children were dancing, Margaret said to me, "Papa, do you know that your protégée is very interesting? Her eyes are beautiful: she is lovely when she smiles; look at her now when she is watching the children. Oh, see Bertie doing his hornpipe! Oh, papa, was ever anything so cunning in this world!"

My daughter leaned forward and forgot all but her son, and I was a good deal taken up with the little fellow's steps myself—in fact, it was superior dancing for a six-year old. Margaret says so, and I believe it. When he finished and made his pretty bow, a good many clapped, and the little musician joined softly, as if she couldn't help it. The children had made acquaintance with her somehow in calling for the tunes they liked, and they seemed to think she belonged to them; she was so small and quiet, I really believe the chickens took her for another child. So when we all went to the dining-room, where the tree was set up—the servants coming in from the opposite door to get their presents, and the young lady, the only person in the house left outside—little Bertie suddenly rushed back of his own accord, and led her in resolutely by the hand. She tried to stop by the door, but he insisted upon her coming in to see the tree so determinedly that she had to do it, and afterwards the major got a chair for her by the door. Nothing ever puts Margaret out, and she never puts anybody else out. My daughter, Mrs. Sinclair, is an uncommonly sweet woman; she took down some little thing from the tree—something of black lace—and carried it herself to the lonely-looking stranger. The girl's face flushed up as she sat looking at Margaret, and all at once she was quite a different person—for a moment I should scarcely have known her. She went quietly back to the parlor in a short time, and played steadily all the rest of the evening. At twelve our little frolic broke up, and then my protégée thanked Margaret again and all of us, she said, "for our kindness to her," and said Good-night quite prettily, put on her thin cloak and started off in the storm. Then the major made the first step.

"I won't stand it," said he; and he got into his ulster, took a heavy shawl that hung up handy, and started after her. We sat and looked at each other.

"That boy is crazy," says his mother; "what a cold he'll catch! Why didn't you stop him, Peter?"

"I couldn't, my dear," says I, laughing. "I'm an old man."

"Elliot is very kind-hearted," said Margaret, looking doubtful.

"So he is, Maggie," said I, "and worse—he's romantic?"

We sat by the fire talking for nearly two hours before the major came in, looking quite alert, as he used to when he was home on furlough.

"It is a terrible night," said he, shaking snow from his coat. "Wouldn't it have been a shame for me to have let that little young lady go home alone? The cars are blocked by the snow, and we had to walk over to the west side in the teeth of the wind. I don't believe she could have done it by herself, poor thing."

"Who is she?" says his mother. "Did you find out, Elliot?"

"Yes: she is Miss de Lisle," said the major, holding his hands to the fire. "She made me go in to get warm, and I saw her father. I should think he was French, and he appears like a gentleman. He is partially paralyzed; he looked very ill. They two seem to be quite alone. I believe they are worthy of your kind help, mother."

"I will see about it, Elliot," said my wife, sleepily getting out of her chair.

My wife before long gave one of her swell parties, and had Miss de Lisle with her harp in the orchestra. How she managed it with the other musicians I don't know. I presume it was a cash business, but it helped the young lady. I noticed her myself a great deal that night, for I was awfully tired of it all, and I am not allowed to go to bed as I should be glad to do on such occasions. How can it be amusing to watch a lot of young fools going solemnly through that stupid performance they call the German? And by two o'clock in the morning there's no one left to talk to, and you've got no brains left to talk if there was. So, as I sat in the corner, half-asleep, I took to noticing my protégée. She looked like a child among the other musicians. She was very neat and trim in her dress. She had a black lace thing round her neck, probably the same Margaret had given her. She played, played, played! and never moved her eyes from one direction, while her little bits of hands ran about, twanging the strings. I changed my place to see what she was looking at, but I could not find out. It might have been my wife, who stood in the doorway with the major—she had on all her diamonds and a new dress from Paris. My old lady has loved finery ever since I first saw her behind the milliner's counter in Milwaukee, and I shouldn't wonder if she imported a dress to be buried in.

When the musicians went to get supper the major joined them, and offered Miss de Lisle his arm. Step number two. He said afterwards that she was so shy and frightened at going alone with all these strange men, that he was sorry for her. He went home with her again—this time in our carriage.

"Elliot," I remarked, very seriously, when I heard of it, "take care that you don't do mischief by giving this little girl the notion that she is a fine lady. Don't you see, it will only make it harder for her to rough it."

"She is as fine a lady as any I know, father," said the major, gravely. His mother opened her eyes and her mouth.

"My dear boy!" said she, "you have always been aristocratic—to hear you talk so of a girl who goes round playing at houses for money! I hate to have people mixed up so! What is the good of being at the top of the first society, I wonder!"

"My dear mother," says Elliot, quietly, "Miss de Lisle is a refined and accomplished lady. She also has a most lovely disposition. You should see her devotion to her poor father; it is wonderful and touching."

"Have you seen it, Elliot?" says I.

"Often," says the major, without any hesitation, "and have tried to help her."

Well, there was no reason why he shouldn't help her if he felt like it, and so I told his mother afterwards, but she wasn't satisfied. She is very exclusive—she tells me she always was; she says the classes should be kept separate, and words that would be used in describing her daughter, Mrs. Sinclair, ought not to be applied to a common working person. With these arguments and a good many more, she made me go and visit the De Lisle family and see what I could do. I started out one day, though it was bitter weather—we had an unusually severe Winter that year. Not liking the job I had undertaken, I was in a hurry to get it off my mind. I didn't think I could do what my wife wanted either; but I couldn't stand so much talk, and so I was bound to try.

It was terribly cold. I knew that by casting a glance seaward—so to speak—before I left it. One of the streets on which my house faces—I have a corner lot, of course—dumps itself into Lake Michigan, a couple of blocks or so away. Instead of being dull gray, the lake was heaped up in high blue-green waves, brownish on the top further out, where they were tossing about like a malicious imitation of the ocean. The grizzly bear of a Rocky Mountain west wind was loose again, howling over the flat country and freezing everything up under it. You couldn't be sure of your nose or your ears or the tips of your fingers if you lost sight of them a minute; facing the wind was like being cut in two with scissors, if it was at your back your clothes felt about as thick as paper. I went in the Madison Street cars, for I would not take my horses out on such a day, and I noticed that the drivers were changed very frequently—as fast, I suppose, as their features thawed out to be available. It was a long way, the house was almost out on the prairie, and I had no little trouble finding it. They had two rooms up-stairs. The woman who opened the door told me to go right up. I went right up, for the hall was cold and had an intolerable musty air in it. I knocked, but no one answered, and, getting impatient, I went in. The room was bare, forlorn, cold; there was no one in it—no one seemed to have been in it for a week. I waited for somebody to come till I was almost frozen, then I went to an inner door and knocked: again no answer, and again I went in without standing upon ceremony. It was a bedroom; no fire, the window raised a little, the air ice-cold. I saw the reason—a straight, still figure on the white bed lying unhurt by the keen wind that fluttered the linen about and over it. Crouched by the side of the bed, half kneeling, half-lying, with one hand clutching the sheet and her face hidden, was little Miss de Lisle, her hair and dress all in disorder, as if she had not slept or changed her clothes for some time. I could not say whether she was dead, too, or had fainted or what! I did not know exactly what to do. I was very glad to hear somebody coming into the first room, and went back there. To my great surprise it was the major, and in such a wide-awake state as he hasn't been seen in since the last great city fire. He rushed at me and seized hold of my hand.

"My dear father!" says he, "how good you are—how noble! You reach here even before me. I have just this moment heard of it. Where is she?"

"Hush!" said I, putting my hand on his arm, he was so excited, and leading him to the place where the forlorn, unconscious creature lay. He was quiet enough then; he lifted her up and we took her away in a carriage he had brought. She was cold and white and blue under the eyes, but she wasn't dead nor quite unconscious, though she couldn't speak, and we took her into the house between us. The thought did cross my mind that this wasn't just what my wife sent me for, but I couldn't stop to attend to it then—perhaps this, on the whole, was better.

Margaret was there and ran into the hall to meet us.

"Oh, the poor little thing!" she cried out. "Mother, where shall we put her?"

"In the blue room—it's the most cheerful," said her mother, quickly, without thinking, and up they ran to get things ready.

It wasn't for her airs nor her love of finery that I married my old lady; I hope I'm too smart a man not to look for a better return for my investments than that. She did everything she could think of to make the young lady comfortable, though in an absent-minded kind of a way, as if she was asleep and didn't mean to wake up, but just as carefully as if it was for her daughter, Mrs. Sinclair. When we left the young lady to her, I thought to myself that I very seldom made bad bargains, and I certainly didn't make one when I got married.

Well, Miss de Lisle got better, and was able to go home for her poor father's funeral. Margaret and the major went, too, and brought her back with them afterwards. The evening of the second day we were sitting round the fire after dinner. Miss de Lisle looking smaller than ever in the big easy-chair, with a black shawl wrapped about her. I may have dozed a little, but I roused up and saw the major draw his chair close by my protégée's and take her hand in his.

"My dear mother," said he, looking across at her, and not at the young lady, "I have asked Miss Estelle de Lisle to be my wife. It is the strongest wish of my heart; but she refuses, fearing that her entrance into our family will not be pleasing to you and my father. Will you assure her that she is mistaken?"

I sat up straight and clinched my fists on the arms of my chair. I was so surprised. I was afraid to look at my wife, but I did, out of natural curiosity to see how she took it. As sure as I sat there she was beginning to cry. She got up, walked over to the little one, put her arms round her and gave her a hearty kiss. I immediately followed suit. The major jumped up and kissed his mother, and I thought I had better kiss somebody, so I kissed Margaret. Then Estelle began to cry so alarmingly, that they took her away to lie down, and my son and I were left alone.

"She is quite worn," said the major, sadly. "She has supported her father and nursed him in his illness besides. She would not send to me even when he died. I don't think they have a friend in the city except ourselves. Without that little accident what would have become of her?"

Then he told me her story. Her father married an English girl whom he was teaching music, married her against her friends' wishes. They came to this country—had bad luck; the mother died, and Estelle helped her father until his health failed, when she took the whole upon herself. Her music scholars fell off, and she did whatever she could find to do, but they had gone very far down into poverty. Poor thing, poor thing! how little I troubled myself about her white cheeks when I noticed them in the street that evening! That is the way we go through the world!

But her cheeks are plump enough now, and she is considered by most people to be a very pretty woman. After their quiet wedding the major took her to Italy and the South of France for a year; then they came home and settled down with us. We are all very fond of Estelle, and if anybody in society makes disagreeable remarks—as my wife feared might be the case—about Peter Prentiss's daughter-in-law, they are very careful not to let them get to me, nor to my wife, nor to Major Elliot P. Prentiss, nor to my daughter, Mrs. Washington Sinclair. So we are all right and very happy. My wife laughs when she says it was all my doing; and the major solemnly thanks me every year for my Christmas gift to him of Estelle.

THE INDICTED LAND LEAGUERS.

THE eyes not only of Europe but of the entire civilized world are turned towards that small little spot of verdant earth known on the map as Ireland. Expectation on this side of the Atlantic is upon tiptoe, and the State trials which are to open in Dublin on the 28th instant will undoubtedly take rank in the causes célèbres which from time to time have marked the entente cordiale existing between Great Britain and Ireland. The great lights of the Irish Bar—so celebrated since the days of Grattan, and Curran, and Plunkett, and O'Loughlin, and Shiel, and Whiteside and Butt—have been retained by the Crown, while the lesser luminaries, but more than one of them—notably Mr. A. M. Sullivan, M. P., full of fiery eloquence—are arrayed on the side of Parnell and the Land Leaguers, who, having burnt their boats and cut down the bridges behind them, are prepared to stand or fall by the side of the Irish tenant as against the terrorism of the agent and British corn-reaping bayonets.

Mr. Forster, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and his colleagues, notably "Tom" Burke, the "castle hack" of hacks, are trying an experiment which will be rightly judged by its results. If they can restore order and protect life and property, without alteration of the ordinary law, they will have conformed to constitutional theory, and they will secure the more substantial advantage of reminding "dangerous demagogues" that they have further powers in reserve. They will doubtless cite in vindication of their present action an encouraging precedent. Nearly forty years ago O'Connell, who had brought Ireland to the verge of rebellion, was cowed and finally silenced by a prosecution and a short imprisonment. But O'Connell was old, while the leaders of the Land League are, for the most part, in the prime of life; and even the Fenians would find it difficult to outbid their appeals to the passions of the populace.

"Charlie" Parnell is so familiar to us, that it is sufficient to say that he heads the list of the defendants. He was enjoying the otium cum dignitate at Avondale, near the celebrated Vale of Avoca, when he was summoned to Dublin to be served with the writ. Joseph Biggar, Member of Parliament for Cavan, is celebrated as the man who dared to turn the Prince of Wales out of the House of Commons by "espying strangers." Mr. John Dillon, M. P. for gallant Tipperary, is the son of the late John Dillon, who also represented Tipperary in Parliament, one of the '48 men who was transported with Smith O'Brien. Mr. Thomas Sexton, M. P. for Sligo County, is an editorial writer on the Dublin News, crafty, shrewd, rhetorical and full of enthusiasm. Mr. T. D. Sullivan, M. P. for Westmeath, is editor and proprietor of the Dublin Nation, Weekly News and Young Ireland. He is brother to A. M. Sullivan, M. P., and it is he who flung down the gauntlet both inside and outside of the House of Commons to Mr. Forster, the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Mr. T. M. Healy, M. P., has lately been elected to represent Wexford Borough, and is known as one of the most active of the Land Leaguers. Mr. P. Egan is a merchant of Clontarf, where Brian Boroihme "bet the Danes black and blue," and treasurer to the League. Mr. Thomas Brennan, secretary to the League, is a mercantile clerk in Dublin, and Mr. Malachy O'Sullivan is assistant secretary. The next proceeding in the State prosecutions was in the striking of a special jury. The only way by which a special jury can be obtained in a criminal case is under what is called the old system, which is rather more favorable to the traversers than to the Crown. The jury for the State trials will be selected as follows: From the special jury list, comprising 1,500 names, forty-eight will be selected by ballot. These forty-eight names will then again be placed in the ballot-box and drawn out separately, each side having the right to object to twelve. From the twenty-four names thus remaining the jury will be selected, each side again having the right to challenge.

Evidence of the wide and rapid spread of the Land League terrorism in districts hitherto peaceable is increasing daily. Owners and agents complain that the state of affairs is worse than it was a month ago. There is now an almost universal suspension of the payment of rents—Griffith's valuation only being offered on every estate in the districts under the influence of the League.

Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, T. D. Sullivan, Sexton and Dillon have each filed an affidavit in the Crown office on which to ground an application for a postponement of the trial of the traversers, as the date as fixed for their trial would interfere with their constitutional right to be present when Parliament meets.

In his affidavit applying for a postponement of his trial Mr. Parnell says he believes the Crown acted with a view of securing the absence of the traversers, who are Members of Parliament, from the House of Commons.

A large meeting of the Grand Orange Lodge of Ireland has resolved to advise the Ulster Lodge to organize counter demonstrations on the same days and at the same places which are appointed for Land League meetings. It is a very pretty quarrel as it stands.

Condition of our Navy.

THE annual reports of the Chiefs of Bureaus of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1880, give the present number and class of vessels comprising our navy as follows:

In Commission.		Store Ships.
Steamers	29	Steamers	1
Sailing ships	4	Sailing ships	3
Monitors	8	On the Stocks.
Torpedo boats	2	Steamers	5
Total	43	Sailing ships	1
In Ordinary.		Monitors	4
Steamers	13	Ironclads	3
Sailing vessels	8	Repairing steamers	9
Monitors	7	At the Naval Academy.
Receiving Ships.		Sailing ships	3
Steamers	3	Monitors	1
Sailing ships	3	Public Marine School.
Monitors	1	Sailing ships	1

Tugs of all kinds at yards and stations, 25.
Total number of vessels, 139.

In concluding his report Chief Easby says: "A brief inspection of the foregoing list of vessels will show the necessity of an increase in the number of efficient vessels for the navy. The finishing of the five monitors and two cruising ships, now commenced, and the improvement and repairs to the Dictator are of the first importance. This addition to our small navy would be of great advantage. We have now in the Bureau a number of plans of unarmored cruisers and of iron-armored rams, furnished by the Naval Constructors attached to the different yards under the order of the Bureau. These plans can be made use of at any time the Department may direct, but for the present I respectfully recommend the building of two armored ships of a displacement of 3,500 tons each, and of three unarmored gunboats, having each a displacement of 700 tons. The estimated cost of these vessels under this Bureau is $2,800,000, but an appropriation of only $1,500,000 will be required for the first year."

The Government Detective Service.

THE report of Chief Brooks, of the Secret Service, shows that during the year the Secret Service made 403 arrests, of which 203 were for dealing in counterfeit money. The sentence of the persons arrested would amount to 343 years' imprisonment, and the amount of fines to $41,712. The amount of the counterfeit money captured was $37,788, together with a large number of plates and other contraband material. The amount expended by the service during the fiscal year was 161,108. In the matter of Executive clemency, Chief Brooks recommends the adoption of a modification of the French police system, by which criminals set at liberty before the expiration of their sentences shall be compelled at stated times to report their whereabouts to the Government, or be considered and treated as fugitives from justice. There is no more efficient department of the public service than that of which Chief Brooks has the direction.

A Civil Marriage in Georgia.

THE Walker County (Ga.) Messenger says: "A newly-elected justice of the peace in this region who had been used to drawing deeds and wills and little else was called upon, as his first official act, to marry a couple who came into his office very hurriedly and told him their purpose. He lost no time in removing his hat, and remarked:

"'Hats off in the presence of the court.' All being uncovered, he said: 'Hold up your right hands. You, John Marvin, do solemnly swear that to the best of your knowledge and belief you take this yer woman, ter have an ter hold for yerself, yer heirs, exekyurters, administrators and assigns, for your an' their use an' behoof for ever?'

"'I do,' answered the groom.

"'You, Alice Ewer, take this yer man for your husband, ter hev an' ter hold for ever; an' you do further swear that you are lawfully seized in fee simple, are free from all incumbrances, and hev good right to sell, bargain and convey to the said guarantee yerself, yer heirs, administrators and assigns?'

"'I do,' said the bride, rather doubtfully.

"'Well, John, that'll be about a dollar'n' fifty cents.'

"'Are we married?' asked the bride.

"'Yes, when the fee comes in.' After some fumbling it was produced and handed to the 'court,' who pocketed it and continued: 'Know all men by these presents that I, being in good health and of disposin' mind, in consideration of a dollar'n' fifty cents, to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do and by these presents hev declared you man and wife during good behavior and until otherwise ordered by the courts.'"

Emigration from Canada to the United States.

THE French papers in the Province of Quebec are deprecating the loss of population by emigration to the States. The Quotidien says the bishops have in vain issued mandates with the object of stopping the outflow, and in vain the parish priests have seconded the efforts of the bishops, for, "in spite of all that, the mania of expatriation continues in activity." That journal suggests a remedy, however. It demands the punishment of those who decoy away the unwary. But this would not be an easy task, and its execution would perhaps breed trouble. Mr. David, in the Quebec Tribune, has another remedy. He thinks the local Government should assist the surplus population to settle on the land. This is undoubtedly the best remedy, though it would become difficult of execution the moment the Government attempted to supply anything more than the land.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Ancient Remains of the Laurium Mines in Greece.

In our last issue we gave a general view of the silver mining district of Laurium, in Greece. In this will be found two sketches of those ancient remains of the mining industry which served to enrich the Athenian Republic. The Laurium mines were formerly leased by the Government to a mixed company, who disagreed with the authorities upon financial arrangements. Operations were then suspended until a few years ago when the privilege of collecting the scoriæ left from the ancient mining operations, and extracting the gold which remained in that substance by means of chemical processes unknown to the Greeks of antiquity, was granted to a new company and its undertaking has been very successful.

A Montenegrin Outpost.

During the week ending November 27th, the Montenegrins occupied the whole district of Dulcigno, the Albanians who came to the assistance of the Dulcignotes being repulsed with inconsiderable loss. The belief is entertained that the Porte's energetic action in regard to the cession of Dulcigno was due partly to the suspicious attitude of the Albanian League, and partly to the military preparations by Greece. Dispatches of December 1st showed that the Greek claim for more territory is receiving prompt attention from European Cabinets, and that Turkey evinces a desire to settle the affair without the direct intervention of other Powers. Our present illustration gives a view of the Montenegrin outpost at Pecorita, on the road leading from Antivari to Scutari.

Expulsion of Religious Orders in France.

The French Republic continues its forcible execution of the March decrees, by which all religious Orders that have not a state charter or authorization are broken up. The members deny the legality of the decrees, likening them to the old lettres de cachet of the kings. They appeal to the courts, but the courts have avoided the question. The religious, falling back on their rights as citizens, yield only to force. This has led to strange scenes. Our illustration shows the authorities carrying by assault, after a four days' siege, the monastery of St. Michel de Frigoulet, occupied by the Premonstratensians. The monastery is on a mountain near Tarascon in the department of Bouches du Rhone. A brigade of cavalry and infantry, commanded by General Guyon Vernier, was sent against the place. Three lines of investment were drawn up, and skirmishers thrown out on the heights. The first plan of campaign was to reduce the place by famine, but the cold on the mountain was so intense that the soldiers, who had not come prepared for a Winter campaign on the mountain, began to suffer severely. Accordingly, on the 8th of November, an order was given for a general assault on the place, and the monastery was taken by storm, fortunately without loss of life.

The Land League Demonstration at Limerick.

Mr. Parnell arrived in Limerick on Monday, November 7th, when a large Land League demonstration was held, the procession being headed by the members of the Corporation, and the city fire brigade, and various local societies taking part. The weather was very wet, but this seemed not to damp the ardor of the people, who shouted and cheered as they marched through the streets on the way to the place of meeting, where Messrs. Parnell, Dillon, O'Sullivan, Synan and O'Shaughnessy made speeches of the customary type, and resolutions pledging the meeting to support the Land League in all its undertakings were carried with unanimity and enthusiasm. On the way back there was more demonstration and shouting, and as the procession passed the statue of O'Connell a posse of mounted demonstrators grouped themselves around the memorial and yelled in honor of the great agitator of the past. The constabulary were judiciously kept out of sight, though in constant readiness, and the soldiers were of course confined to barracks for the day. In the evening a banquet was given to Mr. Parnell at the Athenæum Club, and next day the Freedom of the City was presented to him in the Town Hall. The document was inclosed in a handsome casket made from a piece of Irish oak, which had once formed part of the timbers of the old cathedral.

The Hall of the Lost Footsteps in the Palace of the Senate.

The Chambers will soon be occupied with their sessional work, and the Senate, on its return, will find itself in possession of the Marvelous Hall of the Lost Footsteps, an illustration of which we publish in our pictorial columns. Formerly the Hall of the Throne, and not completed in 1870, this gorgeous apartment has remained in an unfinished condition during the time that the Palace of the Luxembourg was tenanted by the Prefect of the Seine. The works were resumed upon the re-establishment of the Chambers in Paris. It is in the style of Louis XIV. The marbles are white, blue veined; the reliefs are of bronze massively gilt, while the ceiling is inlaid with gold. The carpetings are of blood-red, and the furniture of tapestry laid on gilt frames. Take it for all in all, it is one of the most gorgeous apartments in the world.

The Kings' Rock at Trollhattan.

The ancient Assyrian monarchs and those of Moab recorded their victories and progresses in inscriptions on the rocks, and have thus secured immortality. The Scandinavian monarchs have chosen the same plan, and we give a sketch of an inscribed rock at Trollhätten, Sweden, on which Gustavus III., Gustavus Adolphus IV., John and his Queen Desiderie, Oscar and his Queen Josephine, have carved their names in the stubborn granite which bids defiance to northern blasts and snows.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THERE is a fresh issue of lava from Vesuvius, descending to the base of the cone.

—THE Patent Office report shows that 12,584 patents were granted during the last fiscal year.

—THE French and American Claims Commission will hold their first meeting on December 22d.

—THE Pope is preparing an allocution condemning the hostile attitude of France and other nominally Catholic powers.

—THE Nova Scotian Government is negotiating for the sale of the railways built by the province, some 241 miles in all.

—THE President has issued a proclamation renewing the discriminating tonnage and import duties from Chinese vessels.

—FOUR more English regiments are under orders for Ireland. The Land League has ordered all money from America to be sent to Paris instead of Dublin.

—THE new elevators to be built at Chicago by the Wabash and the Rock Island Lines will increase the city's grain-storage capacity to about 21,000,000 bushels.

—DURING twenty-seven days of November the Chicago packers slaughtered and salted 935,000 hogs. Last year, for the corresponding period, they slaughtered 707,000.

—THE recent rise in Turkish funds in London and Paris was owing to a rumor that Rivers Wilson had accepted a mission to proceed to Constantinople and preside over an international commission for regulating the finances.

DURING the present year 4,946 miles of new railroad have been built in this country. Capital is seeking railroad investment in preference to other channels. Next year promises to be the year of the most extensive railroad building.

—THE new fast mail line just established between New York City and New Orleans delivers the New York morning papers in Richmond, Va., daily shortly after three o'clock in the afternoon.

—THE Austrian Government's financial statement, presented in the Lower House of the Reichsrath, shows a deficit for the next year of 24,000,000 florins. A duty on petroleum is urged, which it is said will produce a revenue of 4,000,000 florins.

—A CORRESPONDENCE is proceeding between English and Russian diplomatists regarding a mutual pacific policy in Central Asia. Russia has acceded many of England's propositions, and the relations of the two countries are becoming much more amicable.

—AT the Winter Palace there is a room full of diamonds, pearls and other precious stones. An Empress of Russia is allowed to borrow from this room after giving a receipt for what she takes, and generally the grand duchesses are allowed to borrow from it also.

—THE Cape Colony Ministry are urgently appealing to the Home Government for assistance in putting down the Basuto uprising. They complain that they are left almost entirely to their own devices, and that they are unable to cope with the dangers which threaten them on all sides.

—THE Greek Government seems determined to continue military preparations. King George is present almost daily at the drill of the troops. The Golos, of St. Petersburg, says that Russia will continue to support Greece morally, but cannot spend blood or money on the Greek cause.

—THE gross earnings of the Erie Railway last year were $18,693,108, and the working expenses $11,643,925. The income from other sources amounted to $783,956. The interest on the funded debt and rentals of leased lines amounted to $6,042,319, thus leaving a surplus of $1,790,628.

—THE tunnel under the English Channel from Dover to Calais is not the visionary scheme that many persons doubtless believe it to be. One shaft at the Dover end has just been driven successfully, and a second one is progressing so favorably that it is expected it will be finished in a few weeks.

—FROM figures prepared in the Census Bureau it appears that of the $698,351,750 of registered 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds issued, $270,773,950 are owned by individual males, $72,672,800 by individual females, $166,927,200 by State banks and trust companies, $175,966,650 by national banks, and $12,019,000 abroad.

—THE defense of Mr. Parnell and his colleagues will cost about $75,000. Six meetings were held in London a fortnight ago with the object of raising funds, and subscriptions have been widely taken up in Ireland. The Land Leagues counts, however, upon receiving the greater part of the fund from Irishmen in the United States.

—AN effort will be made during the Winter session of Congress to pass the Bill introduced last session by Senator Burnside, providing that the proceeds of the sale of public lands shall be devoted to educational purposes. For the first ten years the money is to be divided among the States in proportion to the average illiteracy of their inhabitants.

—A TELEGRAM from Berlin informs the State Department that the cases of American naturalized citizens who have been arrested in Alsace and Lorraine on charges of owing military service have been decided in accordance with the claim of this Government. The release of Weil has been already reported, and it is now announced that in his case, as well as in the previous one of Gebres, all fines and penalties imposed by the German Government have been remitted.

—ALASKA is reported by one census enumerator to have a population of 22,000 persons, of which number 18,000 are Indians, 1,800 Aleuts, and 1,000 Creoles. The Creoles are persons of mixed Russian and Aleut blood. There were 128 white males and four white females. This does not include the enumeration of the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory which is south of Mount Elias, a narrow strip of land ten leagues in width. From what is known of this portion it is estimated that the entire population of the Territory is about 30,000, of which number not more than 300 are whites.

—RUSSIAN strategists profit by Professor Nordenskjöld's Arctic achievements. The Government has recently purchased in Sweden three fast steamers, which are about to be dispatched to Semipalatinsk, a Siberian town close to the Russo-Chinese frontier. The route to be taken by these vessels is the following. Round the Norwegian coast, through the White Sea, past Novaja-Semlja to the Kara Sea, and thence up the River Obi. In Tobolsk they will find awaiting them several large transports of small draught, laden with military stores, and carrying strong reinforcements of troops destined for service against the Chinese army, should the complications still pending between Pekin and St. Petersburg result in war. Taking these in tow, the steamers will then proceed up the Irtitch to Semipalatinsk, whence a few forced marches will bring the troops to the Chinese frontier. By this expedient an enormous saving of time and fatigue to the soldiery will be effected in conveying reinforcements from Russia Proper to the extreme eastern limits of the Empire.

THE MILESTONES.

IN boyhood's time how slowly sped
The Winter nights and Summer days;
The weeks were months, the months were years;
How then we chided Time's delays.
The almanac, that lily hung
Below the smoke-stained mantelpiece,
Grew old and stained: it seemed as if
The long-drawn year would never cease.

When manhood came, and stirring life,
Engrossed with care, took boyhood's place,
How soon the weeks and months grew short;
How Time increased his restless pace.
Then fast and faster flew the years,
The milestones, marring each that passed,
Closed up their ranks and fearer stood—
We felt that Time was quite too fast.

Old age comes on; Time sweeps along,
And plants the milestones nearer still;
The backward gaze a graveyard sees,
And buried years the graveyard fill;
So thick they stand the feeble hand
May almost span the space between;
And Time so swiftly sweeps away,
His flying form is scarcely seen.

And life, like some long winding stream,
Its race increases as it runs;
First, idle as a baby's dream,
Then laughing in the Summer suns;
Then, vexed by cataracts, it roars
And hurries wild and recklessly;
Then, weary with the strife, it pours
Its tide into the shoreless sea.

FRANK J. OTTARSON.

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

CHAPTER XII.—(CONTINUED).

LADY LORING'S carriage was waiting at the entrance of the street, with all the children in the neighborhood assembled to admire it. She impulsively forestalled the servant in opening the carriage-door.

"Come in!" she cried. "Oh, Stella, you don't know how you have frightened me! Good heavens, you look frightened yourself! From what wretches have I rescued you? Take my smelling-bottle and tell me all about it."

The fresh air and the reassuring presence of her old friend revived Stella. She was able to describe her interview with the General's family, and to answer the inevitable inquiries which the narrative called forth. Lady Loring's last question was the most important of the series:

"What are you going to do about Romayne?"

"I am going to write to him the moment we get home."

The answer seemed to alarm Lady Loring.

"You won't betray?" she said.

"What do you mean?"

"You won't let Romayne discover that I have told you about the duel?"

"Certainly not. You shall see my letter before I send it to be forwarded."

Tranquillized so far, Lady Loring bethought herself next of Major Hynd.

"Can we tell him what you have done?" her ladyship asked.

"Of course we can tell him," Stella replied. "I shall conceal nothing from Lord Loring; and I shall beg your good husband to write to the major. He need only say that I have made the necessary inquiries, after being informed of the circumstances by you, and that I have communicated the favorable result to Mr. Romayne."

"It's easy enough to write the letter, my dear. But it's not so easy to say what Major Hynd may think of you."

"Does it matter to me what Major Hynd thinks?"

Lady Loring looked at Stella with a malicious smile. "Are you equally indifferent," she said, "to what Romayne's opinion of your conduct may be?"

Stella's color rose.

"Try to be serious, Adelaide, when you speak to me of Romayne," she answered, gravely. "His good opinion of me is the breath of my life."

An hour later, the all-important letter to Romayne was written. Stella scrupulously informed him of all that had happened—with two necessary omissions. In the first place, nothing was said of the widow's reference to her son's death, and of the effect produced by it on his younger brother. The boy was simply described as being of weak intellect, and as requiring to be kept under competent control. In the second place, Romayne was left to infer that ordinary motives of benevolence were the only motives, on his part, known to Miss Eyrecourt.

The letter ended in these lines:

"If I have taken an undue liberty in venturing, unasked, to appear as your representative, I can only plead that I meant well. It seemed to me to be hard on these poor people, and not just to you in your absence, to interpose any needless delays in carrying out those kind intentions of yours, which had, no doubt, been properly considered beforehand. In forming your opinion of my conduct, pray remember that I have been careful not to compromise you in any way. You are known only to Madame Marillac as a compassionate person who offers to help her, and who wishes to give that help anonymously. If, notwithstanding this, you disapprove of what I have done, I must not conceal that it will grieve and humiliate me. I have been so eager to be of use to you, when others appeared to hesitate. I must find my consolation in remembering that I have become acquainted with one of the sweetest and noblest of women, and that I have helped to preserve her afflicted son from dangers in the future, which I cannot presume to estimate. You will complete what I have only begun. Be forbearing and kind to me, if I have innocently offended in this matter—and I shall gratefully remember the day when I took it on myself to be Mr. Romayne's almoner."

Lady Loring read these concluding sentences twice over.

"I think the end of your letter will have its effect on him," she said.

"If it brings me a kind letter in reply," Stella answered, "it will have all the effect I hope for."

"If it does anything," Lady Loring rejoined, "it will do more than that."

"What more can it do?"

"My dear, it can bring him back to you."

These hopeful words seemed rather to startle Stella than to encourage her.

"Bring him back to me?" she repeated. "Oh, Adelaide, I wish I could think as you do!"

"Send the letter to the post," said Lady Loring, "and we shall see."

CHAPTER XIII.—FATHER BENWELL'S CORRESPONDENCE.

I.

Arthur Penrose to Father Benwell.

"REVEREND AND DEAR FATHER—When I last had the honor of seeing you, I received your instructions to report, by letter, the result of my conversations on religion with Mr. Romayne.

"As events have turned out, it is needless to occupy your time by dwelling at any length on this subject, in writing. Mr. Romayne has been strongly impressed by the excellent books which I have introduced to his notice. He raises certain objections, which I have done my best to meet; and he promises to consider my arguments with his closest attention in the time to come. I am happier in the hope of restoring his mental tranquillity—in other and worthier words, of effecting his conversion—than I can tell you in any words of mine. I respect and admire, I may almost say I love, Mr. Romayne.

"The details which are wanting in this brief report of progress, I shall have the privilege of personally relating to you. Mr. Romayne no longer desires to conceal himself from his friends. He received a letter this morning which has changed all his plans, and has decided him on immediately returning to London. I am not acquainted with the contents of the letter, or with the name of the writer, but I am pleased, for Mr. Romayne's sake, to see that the reading of it has made him happy.

"By to-morrow evening I hope to present my respects to you."

II.

Mr. Bilfrake to Father Benwell.

"SIR—The inquiries which I have instituted, at your request, have proved successful in one respect.

"I am in a position to tell you that events in Mr. Winterfield's life have unquestionably connected him with the young lady named Miss Stella Eyrecourt.

"The attendant circumstances, however, are not so easy to discover. Judging by the careful report of the person whom I employ, there must have been serious reasons, in this case, for keeping facts secret and witnesses out of the way. I mention this, not to discourage you, but to prepare you for delays that may occur on our way to discovery.

"Be pleased to preserve your confidence in me, and give me time—and I answer for the result."

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.—THE PICNIC DANCE.

A FINE Spring, after a Winter of unusual severity, promised well for the prospects of the London season.

Among the social entertainments of the time, general curiosity was excited, in the little sphere which absurdly describes itself under the big name of Society, by the announcement of a party to be given by Lady Loring, bearing the quaint title of a Picnic Dance. The invitations were issued at an unusually early hour; and it was understood that nothing so solid and so commonplace as the customary supper was to be offered to the guests. In a word, Lady Loring's ball was designed as a bold protest against late hours and heavy midnight meals. The younger people were all in favor of the proposed reform. Their elders declined to give an opinion beforehand.

In the small inner circle of Lady Loring's most intimate friends, it was whispered that an innovation in the matter of refreshments was contemplated, which would put the tolerant principles of the guests to a severe test. Miss Notman, the housekeeper, politely threatening retirement on a small annuity, since the memorable affair of the oyster-omelette, decided on carrying out her design when she heard that there was to be no supper. "My attachment to the family can bear a great deal," she said. "But when Lady Loring deliberately gives a ball, without a supper, I must hide my head somewhere—and it had better be out of the house!" Taking Miss Notman as representative of a class, the reception of the coming experiment looked, to say the least of it, doubtful.

On the appointed evening, the guests made one agreeable discovery when they entered the reception rooms. They were left perfectly free to amuse themselves as they liked.

The drawing-rooms were given up to dancing, the picture-gallery was devoted to chamber music. Chess-players and card-players found remote and quiet rooms especially prepared for them. People who cared for nothing but talking were accommodated to perfection in a sphere of their own. And lovers (in earnest or not in earnest) discovered, in a dimly-lit conservatory with many recesses that ideal of discreet retirement which combines solitude and society under one roof.

But the ordering of the refreshments failed, as had been foreseen, to share in the approval conferred on the arrangement of the rooms. The first impression was unfavorable. Lady Loring, however, knew enough of human nature to leave results to two potent allies—experience and time.

Excepting the conservatory, the astonished guests could go nowhere without discovering tables prettily decorated with flowers, and bearing hundreds of little pure white china plates, loaded with nothing but sandwiches. All varieties of opinion were consulted. People of ordinary tastes, who liked to know what they were eating, could choose conventional beef or ham, incased in thin slices of bread of a delicate flavor quite new to them. Other persons, less easily pleased, were tempted by sandwiches of pâté de fois gras, and by exquisite combinations of chicken and truffles, reduced to a creamy pulp which clung to the bread like butter. Foreigners, making experiments, and not averse to garlic, discovered the finest sausages of Germany and Italy transformed into English sandwiches. Anchovies and sardines appealed, in the same unexpected way, to men who desire to create an artificial thirst—after having first ascertained that the champagne was something to be fondly remembered and regretted, at other parties, to the end of the season. The hospitable profusion of the refreshments was all-pervading and inexhaustible. Wherever the guests might be, or however they were amusing themselves, there were the pretty little white plates perpetually tempting them. People eat as they had never eat before, and even the inveterate English prejudice against anything new was conquered at last. Universal opinion declared the Picnic Dance to be an admirable idea, perfectly carried out.

Many of the guests paid their hostess the compliment of arriving at the early hour mentioned in the invitations. One of them was Major Hynd. Lady Loring took her first opportunity of speaking to him apart.

"I hear you were a little angry," she said, "when you were told that Miss Eyrecourt had taken your inquiries out of your hands."

"I thought it rather a bold proceeding, Lady Loring," the major replied. "But as the general's widow turned out to be a lady, in the best sense of the word, Miss Eyrecourt's romantic adventure has justified itself. I wouldn't recommend her to run the same risk a second time."

"I suppose you know what Romayne thinks of it?"

"Not yet. I have been too busy to call on him since I have been in town. Pardon me, Lady Loring, who is that beautiful creature in the pale-yellow dress? Surely, I have seen her somewhere before?"

"That beautiful creature, major, is the bold young lady of whose conduct you don't approve."

"Miss Eyrecourt!"

"Yes."

"I retract everything I said!" cried the major, quite shamelessly. "Such a woman as that may do anything. She is looking this way. Pray introduce me."

The major was introduced, and Lady Loring returned to her guests.

"I think we have met before, Major Hynd," said Stella.

Her voice supplied the missing link in the major's memory of events. Remembering how she had looked at Romayne on the deck of the steamboat, he began dimly to understand Miss Eyrecourt's otherwise incomprehensible anxiety to be of use to the General's family.

"It was on the passage from Boulogne to Folkestone, and my friend was with me. You and he have no doubt met since that time?" He put the question as a mere formality. The unexpressed thought in him was, "Another of them in love with Romayne; and nothing, as usual, likely to come of it."

"I hope you have forgiven me for going to Camp's Hill in your place," said Stella.

"I ought to be grateful to you," the major rejoined. "No time has been lost in relieving these poor people, and your powers of persuasion have succeeded where mine might have failed. Has Romayne been to see them himself since his return to London?"

"No. He desires to remain unknown, and he is kindly content, for the present, to be represented by me."

"For the present?" Major Hynd repeated.

A faint flush passed over her delicate complexion. "I have succeeded," she resumed, "in inducing Madame Marillac to accept the help, offered through me, to her son. The poor creature is safe, under kind superintendence, in a private asylum. So far, I can do no more."

"Will the mother accept nothing?"

"Nothing, either for herself or her daughter, so long as they can work. I cannot tell you how patiently and beautifully she speaks of her hard lot. But her health may give way—and it is possible, before long, that I may leave London." She paused; the flush deepened on her face. "The failure of the mother's health may happen in my absence," she continued, "and Mr. Romayne will ask you to look after the family, from time to time, while I am away."

"I will do it with pleasure, Miss Eyrecourt. Is Romayne likely to be here to-night?"

She smiled brightly and looked away. The major's curiosity was excited—he looked in the same direction. There was Romayne, entering the room, to answer for himself.

What was the attraction which drew the unsocial student to an evening party? Major Hynd's eyes were on the watch. When Romayne and Stella shook hands the attraction stood self-revealed to him in Miss Eyrecourt. Recalling the momentary confusion which she had betrayed when she spoke of possibly leaving London, and of Romayne's plans for supplying her place as his almoner, the major, with military impatience of delays, jumped to a conclusion. "I was wrong," he thought, "my impenetrable friend is touched in the right place at last. When the splendid creature in yellow leaves London, the name on her luggage will be Mrs. Romayne."

"You are looking quite another man, Romayne," he said, mischievously, "since we met last."

Stella moved gently away, leaving them to talk freely. Romayne took no advantage of the circumstance to admit his old friend to his confidence. Whatever relations might really exist between Miss Eyrecourt and himself were evidently kept secret thus far. "My health has been a little better lately," was the only reply he made.

The major dropped his voice to a whisper. "Have you not had any return——" he began.

Romayne stopped him there.

"I don't want my infirmities made public," he whispered back, irritably. "Look at the people all round us! When I tell you I have been better lately, you ought to know what it means."

"Any discoverable reason for the improvement?" persisted the major, still bent on getting evidence in support of his own private conclusions.

"None!" Romayne answered, sharply.

But Major Hynd was not to be discouraged by sharp replies.

"Miss Eyrecourt and I have been recalling our first meeting on board the steamboat," he went on. "Do you remember how indifferent you were to that beautiful person when I asked you if you knew her? I'm glad to see that you show better taste to-night. I wish I knew her well enough to shake hands as you did."

"Hynd! When a young man talks nonsense his youth is his excuse. At your time of life you have passed the excusable age—even in the estimation of your friends."

With those words Romayne turned away. The incorrigible major instantly met the reproof inflicted on him with a smart answer.

"Remember," he said, "that I was the first of your friends to wish you happiness." He, too, turned away—in the direction of the champagne and the sandwiches.

Meanwhile Stella had discovered Penrose, lost in the brilliant assemblage of guests, standing alone in a corner. It was enough for her that Romayne's secretary was also Romayne's friend. Passing by titled and celebrated personages, all anxious to speak to her, she joined the shy, nervous, sad looking little man, and did all she could to set him at his ease.

"I am afraid, Mr. Penrose, this is not a very attractive scene to you." Having said those kind words, she paused. Penrose was looking at her confusedly, but with an expression of interest which was new to her experience of him. "Has Romayne told him?" she wondered, inwardly.

"It is a very beautiful scene, Miss Eyrecourt," he said, in his low, quiet tones.

"Did you come here with Mr. Romayne?" she asked.

"Yes. It was by his advice that I accepted the invitation with which Lady Loring has honored me. I am sadly out of place in such an assembly as this, but I would make far greater sacrifices to please Mr. Romayne."

She smiled kindly. Attachment so artlessly devoted to the man she loved pleased and touched her. In her anxiety to discover a subject which might interest him, she overcame her antipathy to the spiritual director of the household.

"Is Father Benwell coming to us to-night?" she inquired.

"He will certainly be here, Miss Eyrecourt, if he can get back to London in time."

"Has he been long away?"

"Nearly a week."

Not knowing what else to say, she still paid Penrose the compliment of feigning an interest in Father Benwell.

"Has he a long journey to make in returning to London?" she asked.

"Yes—all the way from Devonshire."

"From South Devonshire?"

"No. North Devonshire—Clovelly."

The smile suddenly left her face. She proceeded composedly, but without quite concealing the effort that it cost her, or the anxiety with which she waited for the reply, to her next question.

"I know something of the neighborhood of Clovelly," she said. "I wonder whether Father Benwell is visiting any friends of mine there?"

"I am not able to say, Miss Eyrecourt. The reverend father's letters are forwarded to the hotel—I know no more than that."

With a gentle inclination of her head, she turned towards other guests, looked back, and, with a last little courteous attention offered to him, said, "If you like music, Mr. Penrose, I advise you to go to the picture-gallery. They are going to play a Quartet by Mozart."

Penrose thanked her, noticing that her voice and manner had become strangely subdued. She made her way back to the room in which the hostess received her guests. Lady Loring was for the moment alone, resting on a sofa. Stella stooped over her, and spoke in cautiously-lowered tones.

"If Father Benwell comes here to-night," she said, "try to find out what he has been doing at Clovelly."

"Clovelly?" Lady Loring repeated. "Is that the village near Winterfield's house?"

"Yes."

GENERAL GARFIELD AT HOME.

HOW HE LIVES, WORKS, AND ENTERTAINS HIS FRIENDS.

THE home of General Garfield is situated about midway between Mentor and Willoughby, on the line of the Lake Shore Railroad. Passengers on that road, in passing, discern near a clump of bare trees a sharply pitched and reddish roof, then a barn and one or two smaller roofs come into view, and before the attention has subsided, the place is left away in the rear. Mentor Station is small and commonplace. There is a wood-pile, a water-tank, and a side-track that is little used in the way of Mentor freight, a small depot and a smaller hotel. The residence of the President elect is modern, and suggests the usual country house, with its broad veranda and its open hall and stairs. The surroundings are all of the farm, except the little office just back of the house and on the edge of that orchard so often invaded during the Summer past. A wheat field lies across the road, a garden to the left of the house, and a few tall locusts stand near the door. When our artist visited the spot, the ground was covered with snow, and the scene without was dreary in the extreme. But within the hospitable mansion of the President-elect there was ample warmth and cheerfulness. All who came—and there were a number of visitors, including Hon. Marshall Jewell, and other prominent Republican politicians—were cordially welcomed, and there was a marked absence of form and ceremony in the intercourse of the host and his guests. Indeed, nothing strikes the visitor to Mentor more conspicuously than the freedom and cordiality of the relations which exist between General Garfield and his neighbors. He goes in and out among them as one of themselves, with nothing whatever in his manner to indicate pride of feeling or that exaggerated self-consciousness which too often spoils men otherwise great.

General Garfield's business office is a small but cheerful apartment, on the first floor of the house. Here he receives his mail and devotes some hours every day to the work devolving upon him in connection with his large correspondence. On the second floor a room is set apart as a consulting office, and here he meets in conference such persons as desire to present for his consideration matters of a private or personal nature. The General's mail is received at a special post-office—a small building located about a mile from his residence, instead of going to the general office at Mentor.

General Garfield's home life is full of pleasant activity and of enjoyment. Its daily routine has been thus described by Major Swaim, his secretary: "He generally rises from seven to half-past, and breakfasts en famille at about eight. The General takes great delight in his family, and makes his table his family altar. At the meals, we usually discuss a book which all have read, or are familiar with, and make its contents a source of entertainment as well as of instruction. After breakfast the morning mails are opened, the newspapers are hastily scanned for telegraphic news, and important matters receive attention, the General retiring with his secretary and short-hand amanuensis to his private office, or 'snuggery,' for the purpose. After that, if the morning trains from the East or Cleveland bring visitors, the General receives and entertains them. Dinner is the same as breakfast with regard to instruction and amusement, it making no difference whether the visitors who partake of it are high or low, senators or soldiers, grand or simple. They can participate in the exercises if they see fit; if not, they can eat and listen.

"The afternoon usually brings more visitors and mails, and to both the General devotes as much time as is possible. Supper is a very pleasant meal, and as the day's labors are pretty well over we devote more time to it than to either of the other meals, the exercises being the same. After supper the General devotes considerable time to the thorough perusal of the leading influential dailies. We get all the principal New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati papers. We look them over before they get to the General's eye, and if there is anything in them of more than usual interest it is marked, that he may see it at once. Usually the General retires to bed between ten and twelve o'clock. Of course, this is but an outline of his life. There are always telegrams and letters by the dozen to answer. General Garfield has two short-hand men as secretaries, and to them he dictates his replies to letters and telegrams. This enables him to do a great deal of corresponding in short time. Of course very important and particularly private letters are written by myself or the General in person. Every one is free to go to church or to stay at home, to pray or to let it alone, as he pleases. There is but one autocrat in this house, and that is the General's mother, and she has too much good sense to interfere in such matters. He is very fond of riding by moral suasion, and he governs his family accordingly. His children are very fond of him, and look upon him as their bosom friend as well as parent. His boys will come to him when home, and talk and counsel with him about their books and studies, or their plays or other occupations, just as freely as they do with each other. The result is that they are all manly and frank in their demeanor, partaking much of his character in this respect."

OUR NATIONAL INDUSTRIES.

BEATTY'S PIANO FACTORY.

OUT into the bright, clear atmosphere of New Jersey, the snow lying like lather on the chins of the mountains! Out past the throbbing mills of Paterson! Out where Boonton's furnaces are in full blast! Out beyond Dover, until, in the lap of dimpled hills, after a two and a half hours' ride on the Delaware and Lackawanna Railroad, I strike Washington, a thrifty little town, which boasts, in addition to the usual outcome of earnest industry, the largest manufactory of pianos and organs in the United States. Arrived at the station, my eyes instantly encountered the splendid pile devoted to the "first great cause" of sweet sound. Built of red brick, it forms three sides of a square, and stands out in bold relief, a monument to the energy and enterprise of the self-made man at whose bidding it sprang into bread-giving existence. A few minutes' walk brought me to the entrance, jealously guarded by two colossal bronze lions couchant, and there came to my ears the whirr and throb and beat that told the bright story of Mr. Beatty's success in their own practical and incisive language. Here I encountered Mr. Daniel F. Beatty, the proprietor of this monster factory, a bright-eyed, brown-bearded, fresh complexioned, cheery gentleman of two-and-thirty, whose presence amongst his employés is ever greeted with a smile, since he has a kind and cheery word for each and all of the men and women who contribute to his fortune, while securing their own honest and comfortable livelihood. Mr. Beatty, who was born in Lebanon Township, Hunterdon County, N. J., in 1846, was a musician in his cradle. Brought up to the farming business, every instant snatched from the plow was devoted to music, and to the melodeon in the old homestead on Schooley's Mountain is this country indebted for the superb instruments which are now turned out from the Beatty factory at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five per diem. Mr. Beatty, who is Mayor of Washington, was elected to the office without solicitation. That he is a popular magistrate goes without saying, while his unostentatious charity has rendered his name a household word in the hearts of the people over whom he presides with so much benefit to them and so much honor to himself.

The factory presents a most imposing façade, since the whole front of this immense structure is 165 feet long and 40 feet wide. The wings extend back 80 feet, and are 30 feet wide. This gives an area of 11,400 square feet on each of the five floors, and a total of 57,000 square feet, or over an acre and a quarter of space, within the walls of the building. The building is frame, with brick basement. Its height to the peak of the roof is over 100 feet. It is lined from top to bottom, and in all its appointments it is one of the most complete factories in the world. The main entrance is on Railroad Avenue. The shipping and receiving doors are on the sides, one on Beatty Street and the other on Beatty Alley. The engine-house is in the rear, between the two wings of the building. The factory is painted in a pleasant dark color, while the words, "Daniel F. Beatty," can be read by the inhabitants in the adjoining State.

I commenced my tour round this little world by entering the first floor. This is the ground floor. It is well lighted by numerous windows, the walls are whitened, and the floor is cemented and dry. At the side of the main room is situated the monster engine, with its two large boilers, its glowing furnaces, its immense coal bins, and its swiftly revolving flywheels. Thousands of feet of pipe convey the steam through every part of the immense structure, and the heating apparatus and ventilation are perfect in their operation. Attached to the engine are two steam-whistles, one of them the largest in the State, and the other a musical whistle capable of producing all the notes of the scale, and easily heard at a distance of seven miles.

The west wing of the first floor is devoted to the "trapwork" department, and here the intricate wire and metal work is prepared. The east wing is devoted to the making of the boxes in which the instruments are packed, and here stand boxes marked for shipment to China, Japan, Australia, all parts of Europe, as well as to almost every section of America.

Entering an elevator, I ascend to the second floor, which is a perfect grove of machinery, while the whirr sets the very teeth on edge. On the east wing and in the main body of this floor are thirty woodworking machines of the newest pattern, and capable of performing the most delicate and intricate work, all performing their respective uses in the neatest possible way, and all turning out thousands of separate pieces which in the west wing are finished and made ready to be put together. All the shaving and other refuse are thrown through an opening to the first floor, and every day are burned in the furnace. Molding-machines, tenon-machines, mortise machines, band saws, jig saws, circular saws and planing-machines—all bobbing, grating, jerking, whirling, swinging, twisting, rotating, flashing, form a strange and eye-straining sight.

In the east wing of this floor is done all the scroll-sawing and carving, and artists are employed to evolve novel designs for the cases. At the side of the main part of this floor is the "drying room," in which the lumber used is seasoned. The temperature of this room stands at 120 to 170 degrees, and to step into it reminds one of the sensuous warmth of the Turkish bath. From $2,000 to $5,000 worth of lumber is packed in this room, and the durability of the cases depends on the thoroughness of the treatment of the lumber in this stage of its progress in construction.

Again I take the elevator and ascend to the third floor. Here is comparative quiet, for on the west wing are the offices of the Secretary and Superintendent. Here are models, designs and drawings made out, the outcome of which we find in the elaborate and artistic cases of the organs. Here is the telephone and the telegraph-wire. One, to speak with Mayor Beatty's up-town office, the other to flash directions all over the States. Here is the stock-room, where are thousands of dollars' worth of wires, rods, felts, carpets, rubber cloth, skins, and all those mysterious items which are needed to form the harmonious whole.

On this floor are the "action-makers" and the "fly-finishers," and the work at this stage is of the most painstaking and particular kind. The instrument is a delicate one, and every defect, every little irregularity must be looked after or a failure is the inevitable result. On this floor, in the east wing, are the "correcting" and "inspecting" rooms, under the absolute control of the superintendent of the tuning department. Here the "voice" is given to it, and much depends on the skill of the artists employed. I found the tuners hard at work, one of whom most obligingly struck a number of full chords with a light yet masterful hand.

In different rooms on this floor are stored hundreds of music-stools, organs and piano-covers, and a medley of things known by name only to the initiated. Boxes of keys, piles of bellowses and rows of key-boards may be seen on every hand, and everywhere the visitor is surprised at the fullness of the stock of materials and the capacity of the factory.

The fourth floor is devoted to the cases and the varnishing of their woodwork. In the west wing are twelve rooms, set apart for the "veicers" and "filers," whose duty it is to put the new woods into shape. The fifth and last floor is used for storing boxes, cases, etc., etc., and all the flotsam and jetsam of this wondrous hive. It is scarcely necessary to say that Mr. Beatty has filled up his factory with the newest and most improved appliances of every description.

A huge elevator in the eastern corner runs from the roof to the lower floor, and is moved by steam. A force-pump on the first floor throws water into every room, and hose is attached to the water-pipe on each floor, to be used in case of fire. Steam apparatus for preparing glue is on each floor. Every separate room is furnished with steam-coil to heat it, so that a regular temperature can be maintained throughout the year—a very essential point in connection with the manufacture of organs.

Having quitted the factory, I wended my way uptown. An immense red brick edifice named the Beatty Building confronted me as I moved along Washington Avenue. In this imposing pile are the Mayor's private offices, reception parlor, music warerooms, and that most essential department—the clerical. This latter bears all the appearance of a well-to-do bank, the various clerks being all ranged at high desks behind plate-glass screens.

The mailing room is a curiosity in its way, and is also the apartment set apart for the storage of newspapers and circulars. A glance at either of these rooms gives one an idea of the gigantic business done by the energetic proprietor of this mammoth factory. As I waited at the station for the up-train, cases from Beatty's blocked the platform, and on reading the addresses upon two of them I found that one was going to Hong Kong, the other to Toronto.

A Japanese Bill of Fare.

IN the last number of the Revue Britannique is published an interesting account of a modern Japanese dinner-party, from which we extract the following extraordinary menu, recommending it to the attention of those who may desire to introduce some startling novelties into the art of dining, as practiced in this country: Boiled ducks, chopped pigeons, bird's-nest soup, roast mutton and bamboo buds, mussels and crabs, tea and cakes, turtle soup, minced dog, braised rats, macaroni soup, black rats roasted, with sweet sauce, salt fish, roast pork, with rice patties, preserved melon-seeds, stuffed sea-frogs, walnuts stewed with betel leaves, ices and fruits. Various wines were served during this amazing entertainment. The centre of the table was occupied by a huge covered bowl containing a good store of sea-fleas, set swimming in Burgundy just before the guests sat down to dinner. By the time the meal was over these vivacious insects had become sufficiently inebriated to exhibit an abnormal and eccentric activity, so that, when the cover restraining their salutary exercises was removed at dessert, they afforded excellent sport to the Japanese gentlemen present, who displayed remarkable smartness in catching them with ivory chop-sticks, and in subsequently eating them alive. To some this may appear a somewhat revolting repast; but, remembering that many dishes which they and the Chinese enjoy have ugly names, that misrepresent their real character, we should suspend our judgment until we hear what the delicacies mentioned actually are. Bird's-nest soup, for instance, is a very different thing from what people who have never been in China suppose it to be, and it is quite possible that even the black rat may be a species of ground game unknown in this country, but not the less edible for all that. We confess, however, that the sea-frog and sea-fleas require a good deal of explanation.

A Prince Earning his Living.

SOME months ago attention was called to the interesting fact that one of the Empress of Austria's brothers, Charles Theodor, Duke in Bavaria, had successfully passed the examination qualifying him to practice as an oculist, and that it was his intention to devote his life to that particular branch of the healing art, in which he had achieved no ordinary proficiency. It appears that his Royal Highness's first operation for cataract, performed by him upon a citizen of Dresden shortly after he had obtained his diploma, resulted in the complete restoration of sight to his patient, and we now learn that he has again operated with entire success upon a sufferer from cataract in the Munich Hospital. The prince is a regular attendant at Professor Arlt's lectures on diseases of the eye, and has in no respect relaxed the assiduousness of his studies since he has become a regular licensed member of the Faculty. Indeed, if report speaks truly, his Royal Highness, Dr. Charles Theodor von Wittelsbach, is fairly on the way to attain high rank among the more eminent practical oculists of Southern Germany. In choosing so noble a profession, not as a mere pastime, but with the high resolve of alleviating human suffering, this illustrious gentleman has set a splendid example to his fellow-princes, the majority of whom, unfortunately, have hitherto displayed a greater predilection for the study of science aiming at the destruction rather than at the saving of life.

A Remarkable Library.

THE latest catalogue issued by Mr Quaritch the London bookseller, indicates that he is the possessor of perhaps the richest collection of illuminated manuscripts ever offered at one time by a single dealer. It includes specimens of every century from the ninth to the sixteenth, inclusive, and represents an aggregate monetary value of about $75,000. The MSS. are nearly all of a devotional character, and some were executed for crowned heads and pious women of rank. The gem of the collection is John Lydgate's "Boke of the Sege of Troy," executed by the author himself. It contains seventy large miniatures, and can be purchased for $8,000. A copy of Wycliffe's New Testament, written about A. D. 1390, and one of the seventeen genuine ones in existence, is offered for $5,000. An Evangelistarium, written about A. D. 870 for Charles the Bald, is valued at the same amount. Of still greater value is a copy of Benton's "Commentary on the Apocalypse," about A. D. 1150, and declared by eminent bibliopoles to be the finest MS. of the twelfth century in existence. The price is $8,000. Lorenzo de Medici's Prayer-Book, an exquisite MS. on vellum of the best period of Italian art, executed about A. D. 1470 for Lorenzo or Giuliano de Medici, is offered at the moderate sum of $400. There are numerous other MSS. in the collection, with prices affixed to them varying from $500 to $2,500.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Electric Light proves to be very effective as an insect trap. Flies and moths are attracted to it from a great distance, and, flying into the arc, are quickly killed.

M. Boudaire has presented to the French Academy the results of his recent Algerian survey. He believes that an inland sea of 250 miles in length may be created without serious difficulty.

A Monsieur Lollet has been recently dredging in the Sea of Galilee. It has a depth of 250 metres, and contains twelve species of fish; the majority of these species have the singular habit of hatching their eggs and sheltering their young in their mouths.

The Excavations at Alsofen, near Pesth, the site of the ancient Roman city Aquincum, which was covered by a land slide, have laid bare an amphitheatre capable of seating 10,000 people, as well as large baths. It is estimated by archæologists that the population reached 180,000.

Medical Investigation has shown that some of the occupations for children at kindergarten schools are calculated to injure the eyesight. Among these are the picking of holes over a heading on paper, braiding bright colored bands of paper, and sewing fine silk upon trimmings.

The Mode in which the Germans keep up their valuable superiority in chemical manufactures is shown by the fact that one of the largest chemical works in that country employs six regular chemists, with salaries varying between $1,500 to $2,500 yearly, and also engage the services of a celebrated chemist exclusively for theoretical work, paying him nearly $10,000 a year. Such facts account for the industry and fruitfulness of the German chemists.

The Triennial Gold Medal, of the Chemical Section of the Philosophical Society of Glasgow, founded in commemoration of the work of Thomas Graham, F. R. S., late Master of the Mint, will be awarded, at the end of the present session, for the best paper on any subject in pure or applied chemistry. Authors are requested to send in their papers not later than February 1st, 1881, addressed to the Secretary of the Section, Dr. J. J. Dobbie, Chemical Laboratory, University of Glasgow.

The Proof that petroleum sources are almost world-wide appears to be abundant, and its use would also seem well nigh coeval with civilization. In one of the Ionian Islands there is a spring which has yielded petroleum more than 2,000 years. The wells of Armenia, on the banks of the Zero, were formerly used for lighting the city of Genoa. In Persia, too, near the Caspian Sea at Baku, numerous springs of petroleum have been known from the earliest times; and those of Rangoon, on the Irawaddy, are said to have yielded, before the general introduction of petroleum among civilized nations, some 400,000 hogsheads of oil per annum.

As we Announced Last Week, the Vienna Geographical Society has issued an appeal for subscriptions for an Austrian expedition, which Dr. Emil Holub has decided on undertaking. Dr. Holub intends crossing the whole length of Africa from south to north. He will start from the Cape of Good Hope and penetrate to the Zambesi, thence explore the Marutsemambunda territory, the watershed district between the Zambesi and the Congo, visit the lake sources of the Congo, and from there through Darfur he will try to reach Egypt. Dr. Holub expects the journey to extend over three years. The expenses, he reckons, will amount to about 50,000 florins, 5,000 of which he can himself supply.

The Fall Meeting of the National Academy of Sciences was recently held in New York City. A large number of papers on scientific subjects were read, and Professor Alexander Agassiz made a report on the dredging cruise of the United States steamer Blake, Commander Bartlett, in the Summer of 1880. The cruise, he said, was undertaken with the object of determining the exact relation of the fauna of the Atlantic Ocean to that met with in the Gulf of Mexico and in the Caribbean Sea. In the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans deep-sea soundings have generally been made to a depth of 1,500 fathoms; in the Gulf of Mexico to a depth of 450 fathoms. Work was begun in June last, south of Cape Hatteras, on a line parallel to the coast, and at an average distance of about 120 miles from it.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MADAME PATTI has been engaged to sing at Nice for six weeks from January 12th. She will be accompanied by Nicolini and Ciampi.

IT is said that Lord Beaconsfield will have another novel ready next year, and that he has made up his mind never to accept office again.

MR. CYRUS H. MCCORMICK has donated $100,000 to the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Chicago to place it entirely out of debt.

THE Princess Blanche of Orleans, a tall, slender and handsome young woman, and the daughter of the Duke de Nemours, is about to be married to the Prince de Ligne.

IT is announced that Lord Beaconsfield intends to make his new mansion in Mayfair the centre of social and political influence in London during the next session of Parliament.

MR. JOHN BALFOUR'S majority over Mr. Ruskin in the vote for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University amounted to 314. The Liberal students were greatly delighted at their victory.

MRS. LYNN LINTON, the clever novelist, is very ill in Florence. She is threatened with total blindness and is shut up in a dark room. Her physicians say that she has just escaped brain fever.

FOR the seventh time in his career as a Freemason, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has been nominated for the office of Grand Master of the Order throughout the United Kingdom.

MR. TENNYSON'S new play, which is shortly to be produced by Mr. Irving, is described as highly tragic. The scene is laid in a city of Asia Minor. Miss Ellen Terry is reported to be delighted with her part.

THE hero of Candahar, General Sir Frederick Roberts, who relieved the beleaguered garrison in Afghanistan, is to be rewarded by a gift of $125,000. Premier Gladstone will move Parliament to that effect.

THE Marquis of Lorne will not resign his position as Governor-General of Canada at the end of three years, the statement to the contrary, made in several London journals, having been officially denied.

SENATOR LAMAR of Mississippi is in very feeble health, and it is regarded as possible that he will never be able to leave his home or take his accustomed seat in the United States Senate. He has failed rapidly since the election.

JOHN T. CRAWFORD, an eccentric of Cincinnati, who died about a fortnight ago, leaving an estate valued at from $30,000 to $100,000, is found to have left his entire property for the purpose of building a home for aged colored men.

MR. EZRIAH B. CORNELL, a brother of the founder of Cornell University, and a widower, more than seventy years old, was married last Wednesday at Ithaca, N. Y., to MRS. HORACE HILLICKER. The wedding caused much surprise in Ithaca.

IT is formally announced that Mr. Langtry, the husband of the "Jersey Lily," will shortly sail for America on business, and it is extremely probable that he will bring with him his beautiful wife, who has done so much for his success in London.

MRS. SCHLIEMANN helps her husband in all his scientific labors, superintending excavations under his direction and bravely disregarding sun and dust. She wears while engaged in this work a plain, trim dress and jacket, and carries a stout umbrella.

MESSRS. DAVID WHITCOMB and Stephen Salisbury, of Worcester, Mass., have promised to pay the expense, estimated at $12,000, of enlarging the Washburn machine shop, connected with the Worcester County Free Institute of Industrial Science.

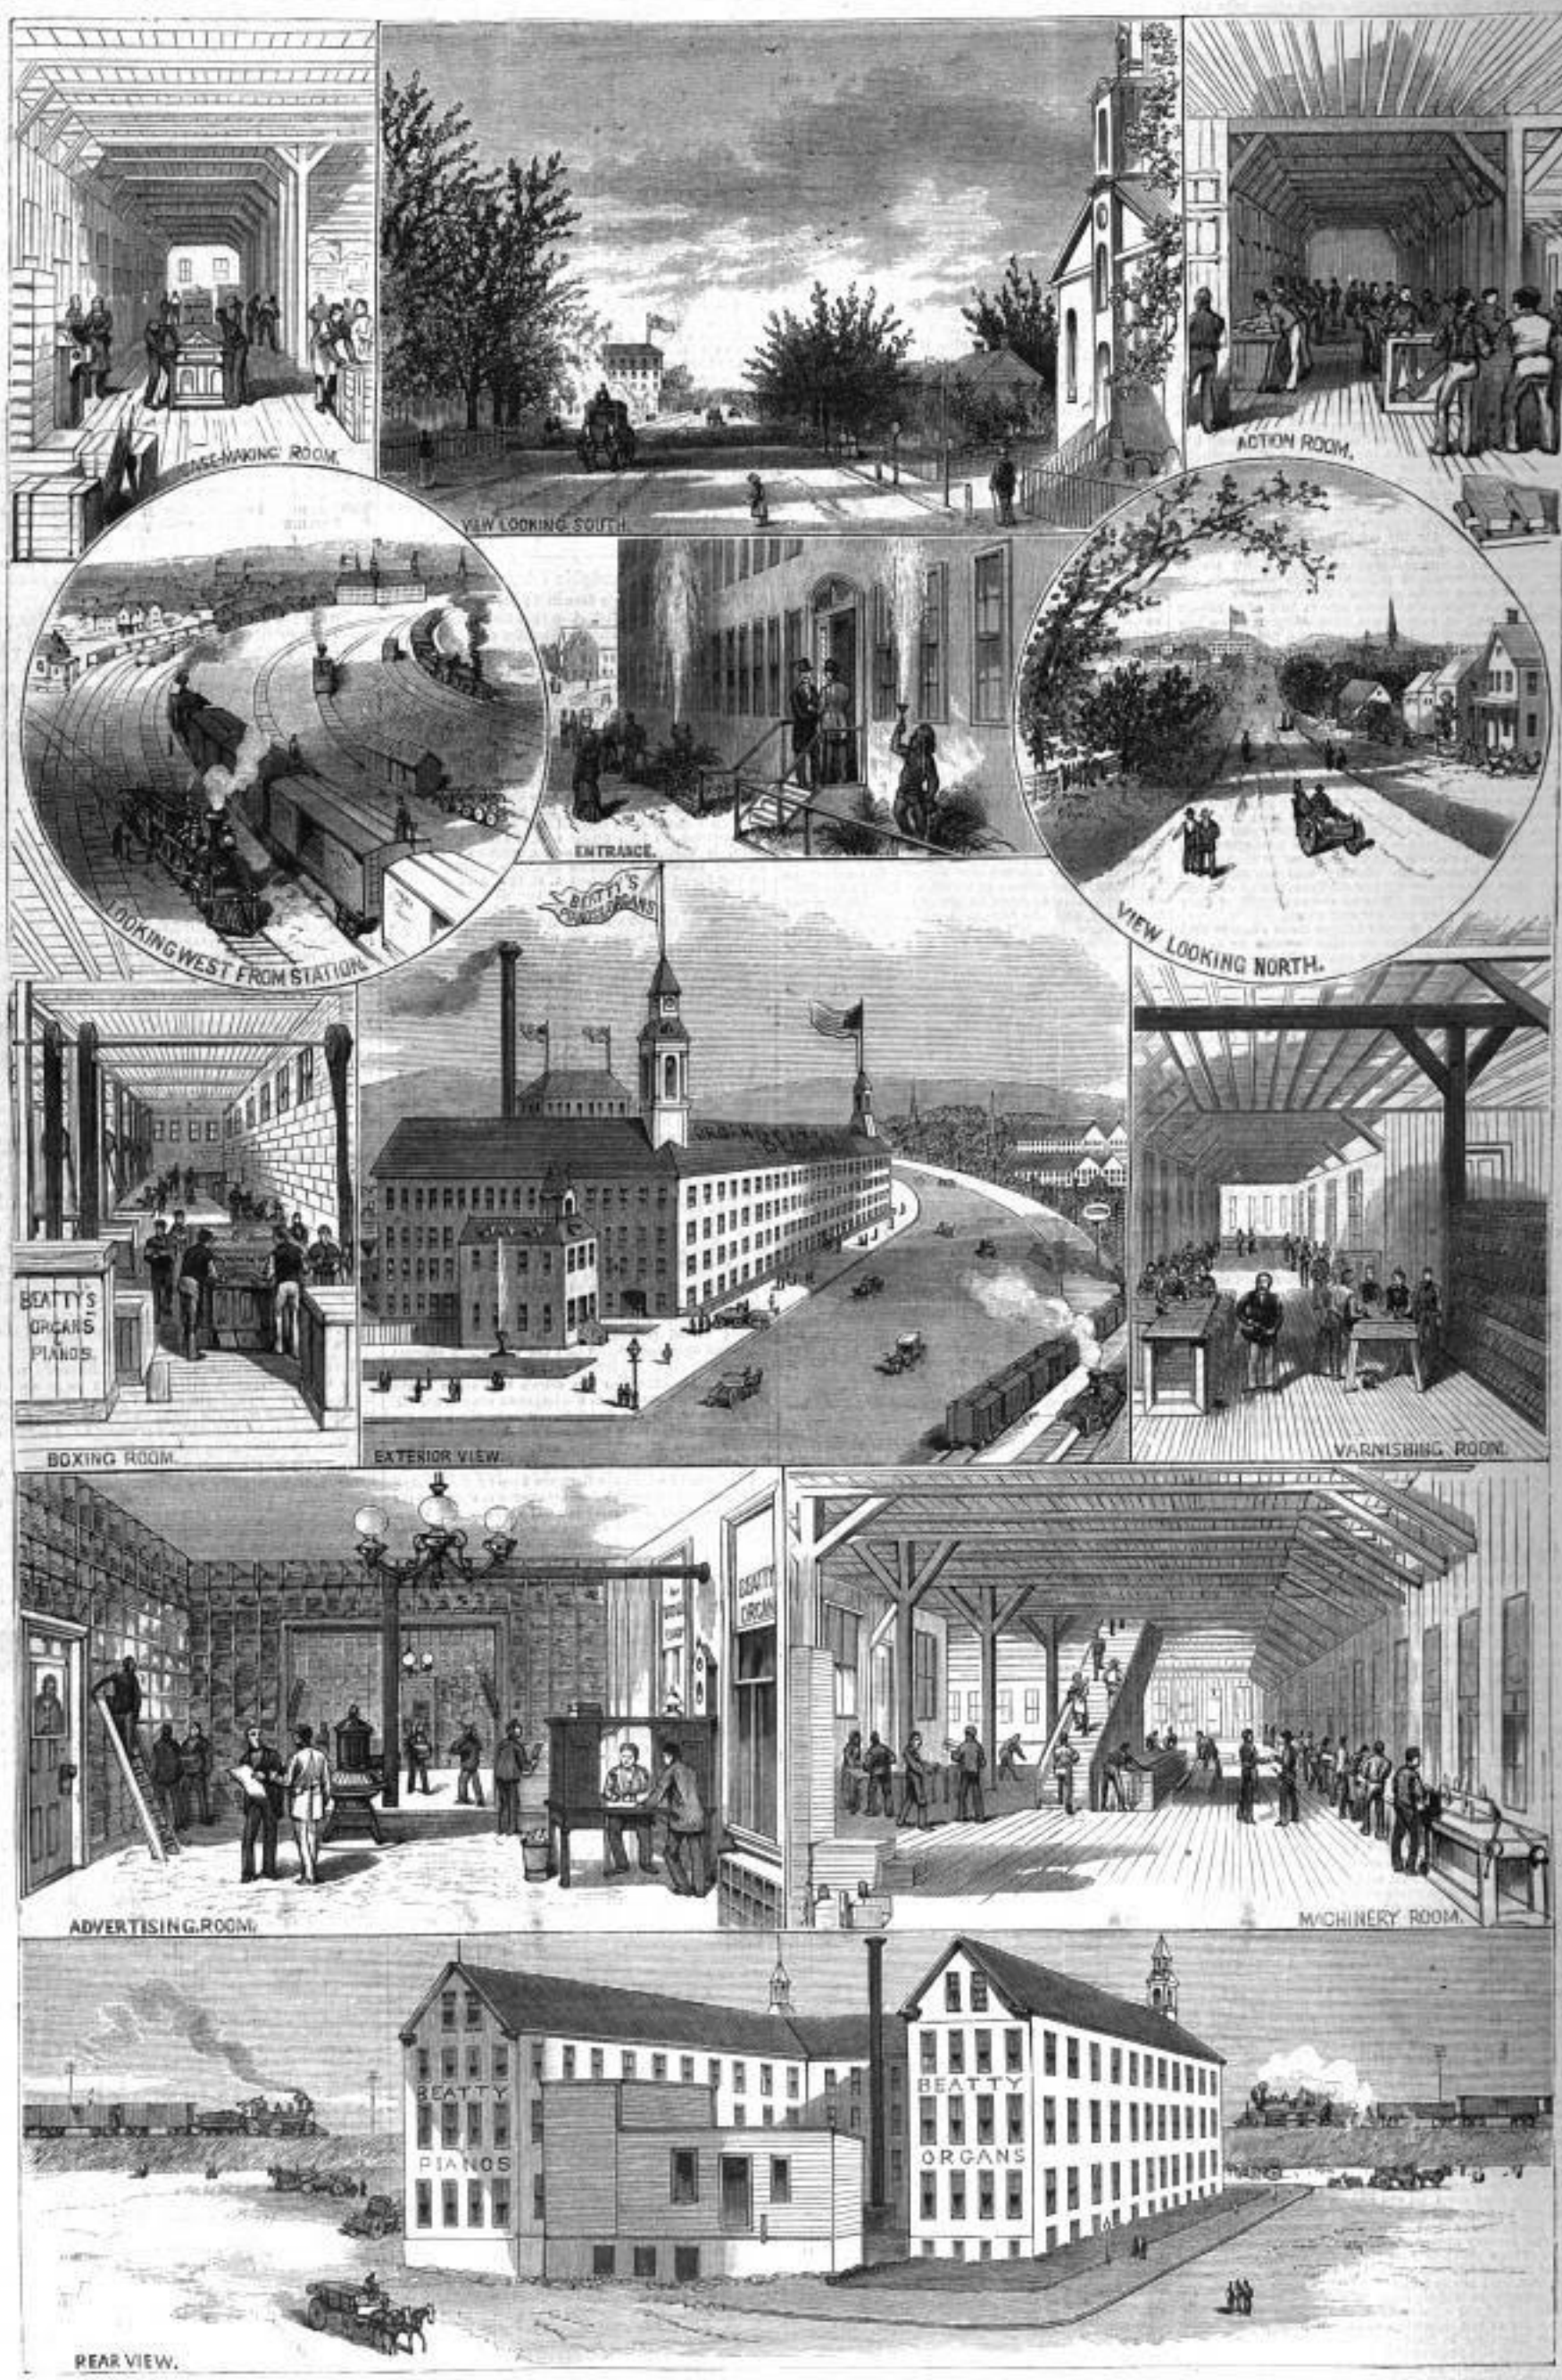
JUDGE E. B. THE Duke Charles Theodor of Bavaria, who some time ago passed his examination as doctor of medicine at Munich, has gone to Vienna to pursue his anatomical studies. The Duke, who has passed his fortieth year, is very fond of his profession and delights in giving his advice gratuitously to the poor.

THE ladies of Ottawa, Illinois, are preparing a silken tapestry hanging for presentation to Mrs. President Hayes, as a testimonial of her high moral worth and courage in banishing the wine cup from the White House. It is to be of blue silk, appropriately decorated and accompanied with an autograph album containing names of prominent men of Illinois.



MISS LENNIE SHERMAN, daughter of the General Sydney Sherman who shared with General Houston the honors of the battle of San Jacinto, has just been married in Texas to a former State Senator. Among the guests were Mrs. M. B. Lamar, widow of one of the Presidents of the Texas Republic, and F. W. Cave, President Sam Houston's private secretary.

THE inauguration of Archbishop Feehan as Bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Chicago, to succeed the late Bishop Foley, took place at the Holy Name Cathedral, November 28th. After the keys and symbols of the diocese had been delivered to the Archbishop, he delivered an impressive sermon. His formal consecration as Archbishop is delayed, owing to the non-arrival of the pallium from Rome.

THE following are the gifts which have thus far been made by Mrs. Valeria G. Stone, of Boston, from the estate left by her husband: To Bowdoin College, to finish Memorial Hall, $20,000; to Bowdoin College, to endow the professorship of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, $50,000; to the Hallowell Classical School, $10,000; to the Fryeburg Academy, Maine, $10,000; to Dartmouth College, to endow the Stone Professorship of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, $30,000; Andover Theological Seminary, to endow the Professorship of the Relations of Christianity to Secular Science, $50,000; on the condition that a subscription of $100,000 for the Phillips Academy be completed, $100,000; Amherst College, to endow the Stone Professorship of Theology on condition of the college raising $25,000, $50,000; Wellesley College, to construct and furnish Stone Hall, $100,000; Women's Board of Missions for Harpoon College, Turkey, $25,000; Young Men's Christian Association, Boston, towards a new building, $25,000; Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., to endow the Professorship of Natural History, $30,000; Chicago Theological Seminary, for the Professorship of Pastoral Theology and Special Studies $50,000; American Missionary Association, for institutions at Nashville, Atlanta Talladega, Tougaloo and New Orleans, $110,000; Oberlin College, Ohio, for endowments, $50,000; Drury College, Springfield, Mo., $50,000; Iowa College, $22,500; Carlton College, Northfield, Minn., $10,000. Mrs. Stone has also given $600,000 to relatives and friends, and $100,000 to churches and needy students and for the redemption of mortgaged homes.

OBITUARY.—C. S. Grafulla, for many years leader of the Seventh Regiment, N. G. S. N. Y., Band, died in New York December 2d, aged 42; James H. Pinckney, an old merchant and fire insurance president, of New York City, on the 2d, aged 70; Silas Merchant, a prominent citizen of Newark, N. J., and fire insurance president, on the 1st, aged 75.

"FATHER" GAVAZZI.

ALESSANDRO GAVAZZI, the famous and eloquent Italian preacher, who reached New York on his third visit to the United States on Sunday, November 28th, is now in his sixty-second year. At the age of sixteen he became a Barnabite monk in Bologna, the place of his birth, and was afterwards appointed professor of rhetoric in a college at Naples. Then he became a monk and a preacher for the Church of Rome. He grew to be as great a favorite with the masses as he was an object of suspicion to his superiors in the Church. He preached liberal views of the most pronounced kind, advocating honesty in religion and justice to the masses. He even attacked the Court of Gregory XVI., and was remanded to the solitudes of a convent—virtually placed in confinement—for his conduct. In all his preachings he never failed to remind his countrymen of their oppressed condition. He strove by all the powers of his eloquence to persuade them to unite and win their freedom.

Among his intimate friends were Hugo Basse and Count Joseph Mastai, the latter a brother of Pope Pius IX. By him Gavazzi was introduced to the Pontiff, who was so impressed with the man's ability that he appointed him to preach the sermon of thanksgiving for his miraculous escape from assassination. In that memorable sermon Gavazzi turned aside long enough to denounce the corrupt practices of the Church. This, together with the well-defined fact that he was a priest whose utterances could not be curbed, led to an order issued by the Pope forbidding him to preach longer. Gavazzi was afterwards imprisoned in the Franciscan convent of La Polviera, and also at Genzano, for his bitter denunciation of the Austrians. He was visited in his cell by 5,000 Romans, and the popular interest in him was so intense that twenty nobles waited upon the Pope and extracted the promise that he should be set at liberty—a promise which was fulfilled within ten days. He afterwards raised a legion of 16,000 men and equipped them for service against the Austrians with the funds raised at a meeting where he delivered one of his most eloquent appeals. So effective was his oratory on this occasion that women stripped themselves of their jewels and threw them at his feet.

In the revolution of 1848, Gavazzi was Garibaldi's trusted lieutenant and his chaplain, and when the troops entered the City of Rome Gavazzi established military hospitals, and organized a corps of 6,000 nurses from among the Roman women who responded to his appeals for aid. The intervention of the French, the rout of Garibaldi, and the flight of his forces, are matters of history. Gavazzi, through the friendship of the American Consul, was enabled to escape to England, where he spent many months in giving to English audiences a description of Italy's miseries and necessities. He came to this country in 1853, and delivered lectures against popery. In Montreal he was mobbed, and his friends were compelled to smuggle him out of the city to save his life. He became a convert to Protestantism, and when the condition of affairs enabled him once more to return to Italy, he entered upon the work of evangelizing his countrymen. In this labor he has been engaged ever since. Its fruition was the foundation of the Free Christian Church of Italy.

Father Gavazzi's third visit to America is to strengthen the interest which Protestants feel in the Free Christian Church of Italy, and to secure additional funds to meet its pressing needs. Since its organization in 1870, this Church has grown steadily, and is gradually making its influence felt in every province of Italy. From a body comprising twenty-three churches with 400 communicants in 1870, it has so increased that now it has seventy-one places of worship and about 2,000 communicants. These churches are found in Rome, Milan, Turin, Bologna, Naples, Venice, Florence, and many smaller cities in Italy. In Rome there is a theological seminary within the very shadow of the Vatican, in which Father Gavazzi fills the chair of Professor of Sacred Oratory. The Free Church of Scotland has given the seminary a Professor of Didactive Theology, and Christians in Great Britain have bought and presented the old Church of San Jacopio in Florence. An opportunity recently occurred to purchase a valuable church on the Piazza San Marco in Venice. It was thought best to secure this edifice, although only half the amount necessary was in hand to pay for it. Father Gavazzi will specially interest himself in the effort to raise the remainder.

ALESSANDRO GAVAZZI.—FROM A PHOTO. BY W. BRADNER.

In appearance Father Gavazzi possesses little in common with the Italian physical types with which Americans are acquainted. He is six feet in height, of well-built figure, and has broad shoulders that are slightly rounded with the weight of years. His features are prominent, his complexion is light, his eyes are keen and kindly, and his hair, which is of an iron-gray, hangs in wavy locks. His thin side-whiskers, however, have been bleached to a silvery whiteness. He is as brisk in his movements as a man half his years. In all respects he is a remarkably well-preserved gentleman. His English, though somewhat broken, is clear, strong and intelligible.

A BABY'S WAKE IN CHILI.

WHEN a young child or infant dies, the baby, after being cleansed, is arrayed in the finest of garments, and placed upon an altar in the best room in the house; a pair of wings are fastened to it, and a crown upon its head; above is hung a dove, and the entire surroundings adorned with flowers and ribbons. A guitarist is provided, who from his seat in front chants and sings airs, generally of a laudatory and lamenting nature, for the loss of the child; but as the "poncha" or drink begins to make itself felt upon the friends who have gathered round, it then becomes a scene of mirth and gladness that the child is now an "angelito" (or little angel). This generally continues for several days, until the body gives forth anything but pleasant odors. This custom at the present day is more general among the lower classes, for, although it exists among the rich, there is nothing of the boisterous style about it.

OUR INDIAN "WARDS."

THE annual report of the Indian Bureau is a document full of interest, presenting as it does conclusive evidence of a steady progress on the part of nearly all the Indian tribes in the ways of civilization. At nearly all the agencies the demands of Indians for implements with which to perform manual labor greatly exceed the means at the disposal of the Bureau. There is no doubt that the disposition of the Indians to work is steadily growing, and a large majority of them are willing and anxious to engage in civilized pursuits. The efforts of a number of tribes in cultivating the soil have been attended with such marked success as to justify the belief that they will at no distant day become entirely self-supporting. During the past year, the Indians, exclusive of the five civilized tribes, have raised 415,777 bushels of wheat, 666,430 bushels of corn, and large quantities of barley, oats, vegetables, etc., while five civilized tribes have raised 2,346,042 bushels of corn, 336,424 bushels of wheat, 395,000 bushels of vegetables, 149,000 tons of hay, etc. The partially civilized tribes own 864,137 sheep, with other cattle. As to the subject of Indian education, the report makes a most gratifying exhibit. It is stated that, during the year, 60 boarding and 110 day schools have been in operation among the different Indian tribes (exclusive of the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory), which have been attended by over 7,000 children and taught by 316 teachers. In the education of the Indian youth, it is the policy of the Bureau to have farm and domestic work occupy as prominent a place as study in the schoolroom, and the development of character and training of pupils in the manners of civilized life is held to be quite as important as acquiring a knowledge of books. Owing to inadequate appropriations, the educational work has not been carried to the full extent desired; fifty thousand Indians at seventeen agencies have no treaty school funds whatever, and for educational facilities must depend entirely on the general appropriation for education. Among those tribes, there are at least 7,000 children of school age. In compliance with the appeals from neglected agencies, the Bureau has made arrangements for erecting eleven boarding-school buildings during the coming season, and for the establishment of thirteen new boarding schools. It is certainly to be hoped that more liberal appropriations will hereafter be made in support of this most important work. It will be cheaper to civilize the Indians by education than to tame them by the savage and costly methods which have been only too largely pursued in the past.

The total number of Indians in the United States, exclusive of Alaska, according to this report, is 265,938, all of whom, except about 18,000, are more or less under direct control of agents of the Government. The civilized Indians now in the Indian Territory number 60,360, and the uncivilized 17,750. There are in round numbers, 25,000 Indians in Dakota, 23,000 in New Mexico, 21,000 in Montana, 17,000 in Arizona, and 14,000 in Washington Territory. It appears that there are upwards of 5,000 Indians in New York State, and more than 10,000 in the State of Michigan.

NEW BOOKS.

HINTS FOR HOME READING (of Putnam's Handy Book Series). New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price, 75 cents.

THE ART OF COOKING. A Series of Practical Lessons. By Matilda Lees Dods, of the South Kensington School of Cookery. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price, $1.25.

Both these volumes form most entertaining reading—the latter, especially, having a practical value. It treats of cookery as both a science and an art, and covers the whole range of instruction in those general principles which have come to have almost general recognition. Instead of a mere stereotyped schedule of dinners, suppers and breakfasts, it presents a comprehensive insight into the general rules for the intelligent preparation of food, while, at the same time, it clearly describes the several means and processes of arriving at desired results. It will be a welcome contribution to the literature on this subject. The "Hints for Home Reading" embodies a chapter of suggestions for household libraries which will be of special interest to beginners in the work of book-gathering.

ABOARD THE "MAVIS." By Richard Markham. Author of "Around the Yule Log." New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

"It is told in this book how five boys and five girls cruise in the schooner Mavis about the east end of Long Island, and how, in addition to sundry 'good times,' they learn somewhat of the early history of their country." This the author tells us in the title-page of a very prettily gotten up volume, charmingly illustrated. Many of the pictures are old friends, by-the-by, while the letter-press is more than usually well executed. Let those who would learn the adventures of the five boys and five girls, and "somewhat of the early history of the country," go aboard the Mavis with Mr. Markham. Price, $1.50. For sale by all booksellers.

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE. A Manuscript Song-Story of the Twelfth Century. Translated into English Verse and Prose by Hoday Macdonough. New York: Ford, Howard & Hulbert.

This is an ambitious attempt to produce a chante-fable of the days of the troubadours and trouvères. It is a decided departure from the sing-song holiday books which, mushroom like, crop up in the book market on the approach of Christmas, and will, doubtless, prove very delectable reading to those who revel in love songs and roundelays. Mr. Macdonough has performed his task with a quaint grace, which lends its charm to the story; and the artists, if not always successful in their illustrations, would seem to have done their spiriting gently. Apropos of the illustrations: Why give us the "Princess Nicolette in Carthage" twice—the same picture—and two pages only of reading matter between? If the Princess need appear on two occasions, she might be allowed a little breathing space. Seriously, there has been considerable careless-ness somewhere. The mechanical execution of the book, albeit many "monks" and "friars"—to use technical terms—displays points of excellent merit, and we have little doubt of the success of the Lovers of Provence. For sale by all booksellers.

MR. O'RAFFERTY is sitting in his room with his head tied up and his arm in a sling, when a little boy sticks his head in and asks: "Me feyther sint me to inquire how your eye was coming on this morning?" "Tell yer feyther to attend a Fourth Ward mating himself and call the chairman a liar, and he will find it all out widout askin'."

A GALVESTON parent is very much discouraged at the way his boys destroy each other's clothes. The other day he saw that little Billy's shirt-collar was torn off, and he angrily asked how it happened. "Johnny did it," was the response. "Well, I'll tan Johnny's hide, that's what I'll do!" "Well, dad, I've paved the way for you. I cut the whole ceiling out of his new pants."

A MAN who employs a great number of hands in a manufactory in the West of Scotland, in order to encourage his work-people in a due attendance at church on a fast day, told them that if they went to church they would receive their wages for that day in the same manner as if they had been at work. Upon which a deputation was appointed to acquaint their employer that "if he would pay them for over hours, they would attend likewise at the Methodist chapel in the evening."

AS AN English vicar was walking along the cliffs opposite Truro, some time ago, a gust of wind took off his hat and whirled it away. Some time after a Methodist preacher, some distance away, was discoursing on prayer, and advised his hearers to pray for temporal as well as spiritual blessings, and cited a case in his own experience. He said that he was recently on the shore, about to proceed to a neighboring town, and added: "My Christian friends, I had on my head at the time a shocking hat, and somewhat blushed to think of entering that harbor town and watering-place so ill-adorned as to my head. Then I lifted up a prayer for covering more suited to my head. At that solemn moment I raised my eyes and saw in the spacious firmament on high—the ethereal blue sky—a black spot. It approached—it largened—it widened—it fell at my feet. It was a brand-new hat by a celebrated London maker! I cast my battered beaver to the waves, my Christian friends, and walked into town as fast as I could with a new hat on my head."

A BEAUTIFUL HOLIDAY GIFT.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIRBRUSH, which has been before the public of this country for several months, is meeting with substantial popular favor, and steadily gaining in sales and reputation. In practical and constant use, the goods appear to give satisfaction, and as the proprietors promise to refund the money if they are not as represented, the purchaser runs no great risk in buying. The New York Shopping Bulletin, in a recent article on Dr. Scott's brush, says, among other things: "We do not for a moment hesitate in pronouncing it one of the most wonderful, curious and useful inventions of the century. The curative properties of the brush are so rapid in their action as to render it a valuable adjunct to every household." The writer of this notice is well acquainted with one of Brooklyn's most fashionable daughters, a lady moving in the highest circles of society, who, for many years, was a martyr to headache, which had become chronic. She was recently persuaded to purchase one of the electric brushes, was perfectly cured, and now declares she would not part with her brush for any amount of money if she could not get another. Highly ornamental in its finish, it makes a handsome appendage to the dressing-table, and now that the holiday season is approaching, and every one looking for something suitable as a holiday gift, we could not possibly suggest anything that would make a cheaper and handsomer present. To sufferers from headache and neuralgia, we would say purchase one of the wonderful brushes, and, applying the words of the immortal swan of Avon, say, "Throw physic to the dogs."

A BEAUTIFUL HOLIDAY PRESENT.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to Royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

IT IS WARRANTED TO

CURE NERVOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE BILIOUS HEADACHE IN 5 MINUTES!!
CURE NEURALGIA IN 5 MINUTES!!
PREVENT FALLING HAIR AND BALDNESS!!
CURE DANDRUFF & DISEASES OF THE SCALP!!
PROMPTLY ARRESTS PREMATURE GRAYNESS!!
MAKES THE HAIR GROW LONG & GLOSSY!!
IMMEDIATELY SOOTHES THE WEARY BRAIN!!
MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

IT RARELY FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, WHERE THE GLANDS and FOLLICLES ARE NOT TOTALLY DESTROYED.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London.
New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From the Mayor of Saratoga.]
August 12, 1880.

"I cheerfully testify to the merits of Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush. It cures my headaches within a few minutes. I am so pleased with it I purchased another for my wife. It is an excellent Hair Brush, well worth the price, aside from its curative powers."
JAS. B. CHAPMAN.

[From Rev. Dr. Bridgeman.]
Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents:—I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. C. Bridgeman, D.D."

218 Fulton Street, New York, August 31, 1880.

"I would Not take $1,000 for my Brush if I could not replace it."

PLINY F. SMITH.

Mr. Smith is a gentleman well known in this City as a Law Publisher, and also as a Director in several Public Institutions of New York.

"Domestic" Sewing Machine Co., New York, August 16, 1880.

DR. GEO. A. SCOTT—Dear Sir: Permit me to add the testimony of my wife to that of the many others who have been benefited by the use of your Electric Brush. She has for years been a sufferer from Neuralgia in an acute form, but since I obtained for her one of your Brushes, she has experienced entire relief. Please accept her sincere thanks.

HENRY HARTLETT.

Round Lake Camp-Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years.

Mention this Paper. Rev. J. D. ROCKINS, Superintendent."

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our office.

Remember that this is NOT a "metallic" wire brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH, LASTING FOR YEARS.

We will send it, postpaid, on receipt of $3.00; or by Express C. O. D. at your expense, with privilege of opening and examining.

Or request your nearest Druggist or Fancy Store to obtain one for you, FROM US.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer? This paper will not knowingly publish any humbug, and I have placed a Brush in the hands of Mayor Cooper and Postmaster James of New York, as a guarantee of my good faith.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 25, 1880.

CAUTION.

Persons desiring to subscribe for any of our publications should be careful to send their remittances and orders to the street numbers—53, 55 and 57 Park Place—of Frank Leslie's Publishing House. Of our publications there are various imitations which may profit from the absence of proper care in this particular. It should be distinctly understood that we never employ traveling agents to solicit subscriptions or collect money for us. Subscribers can remit direct by sending Post Office Money Order, Draft on New York, or Registered Letter, at our risk. In all cases write the address plainly and in full.

In his recent decision sustaining the will of the late Frank Leslie, Surrogate Calvin said of certain imitations of our publications which are now issued in this city, and for which some persons have subscribed in the belief that they were ours: "It is quite apparent that they (the publications aforesaid) were calculated to deceive, and in some extent interfere with the decedent's publications, and when the name Leslie & Co. was printed upon the covers of two of them, the copy of one of decedent's headlines—'The Cheapest Magazine in the World'—placed conspicuously at the top of the cover of the alleged simulated publication and others entitled Frank Leslie, Jr. (when the latter at the suit of his father had ceased to use the name for several years, and resumed it at a time when decedent's business calamities were oppressing him), it may well be doubted whether it needed even an unusually suspicious mind to reach the conclusion not only that they were calculated to deceive, but that they were so intended."

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE annual Message of President Hayes is a lucid, terse and well-considered paper, which covers the whole field of our federal relations, and is so judicious in the most of its recommendations and suggestions that it may be said to call rather for simple analysis than for polemical criticism. Opening with a reference to alleged fraudulent practices which have impaired the integrity of the ballot in several of the late slave-holding States, he remarks that "this disposition to refuse a prompt and hearty obedience to the equal rights amendments to the Constitution is all that now stands in the way of a complete obliteration of sectional lines in our political contests." In so writing, the President (perhaps without intending it), has pointed a moral in praise of his own upright and pacific dealing with the Southern States, in having lifted from them the military coercion which was formerly pleaded in extenuation of the sectional hostility to the Federal Government. We have but to contrast the attitude of these States to-day with the attitude in which they were left by the administration of General Grant, to measure the progress which has been made toward a permanent pacification of the country on the basis of the new rights embodied in the war amendments. And, while calling for "firm and well-considered action" to repress the future manifestations of these encroachments on the elective franchise, he proposes to cut the root of the evil by providing for an education which shall be as universal at the South as the right of suffrage. "The best and surest guarantee of the primary rights of citizenship is to be found," says the President, "in that capacity for self-protection which can belong only to a people whose right to universal suffrage is supported by universal education." The enforcement of this single maxim would be better than a whole arsenal of repressive statutes.

Next in dignity and importance to this "paramount question," the President places the urgent necessity of a reformation of the civil service of the Government in all its departments. On this subject he speaks with no bated breath, for he spares himself as little as his own party when he says that his observation and experience in the Executive office have only strengthened his opinions concerning the dangers of public patronage when used as an implement of politics. "I believe," he says, "that these dangers threaten the stability of the Government," and he therefore calls for the instant adoption of practical measures and plans which shall put an end to the "spoils system" in all its relations—to the bestowal of public places as a perquisite for political services, and to the subornation of political corruption by levying contributions on the office-holding class for the purpose of carrying elections against the unbiassed will of the people. On the whole subject the President leaves some good advice to his successor when, contrary to a supposed suggestion contained in General Garfield's letter of acceptance, Mr. Hayes urges, as "the first step in a reform of the civil service," that there "must be a complete divorce between Congress and the Executive in the matter of appointments." And this representation he bases as forcibly on grounds of constitutional obligation as on considerations of public expediency. Perhaps, when General Garfield wrote that the Executive, in making appointments, should seek "information and assistance" of those whose knowledge "best qualified them to aid in making the wisest choice," he referred to others than members of Congress. Certain it is that Mr. Hayes recommends the passage of an Act "defining the relations of members of Congress with respect to appointments to office by the President," and no act would afford a better criterion by which to test the sincerity of the representative men in both parties, for both parties have witnessed a good confession on this subject. It is only their practice that is deficient.

The President does but speak in the language of political honesty and of a sound public economy when he renews his recommendation that the outstanding legal tender notes should be withdrawn and cancelled, according to the promise of the Government at the date of their issue. As to the expediency of recoining the depreciated silver dollar and making it equivalent in bullion value to the gold dollar we are not so clear in our minds, for such a step would commit the Government irretrievably to the policy of a bi-metallic currency, in which one of the metals used would have to be periodically readjusted to the market value of the other. We are well aware, as the President suggests, that all bi-metallic currencies proceed on this theory, and Michael Chevalier recommended in his day that such a readjustment should be made every six months, but, in point of fact, no nation under the sun has ever yet succeeded in establishing a permanent bi-metallic currency of equal standard value. The more stable of the two metals in point of market value will always be the standard for the time being. The President recognizes this fact to-day when he recommends that the silver dollar should be brought up to the standard of the gold dollar. Two metallic currencies we may have, but more than one metallic standard at a time we cannot have; and since, for the purposes of a subsidiary circulation, we already have more silver coin than the country will use, would it not be best to stop at once the further coinage of the silver dollar? If it were a question about using two yardsticks of unequal length, or two bushel measures of unequal cubic contents, does anybody doubt what the answer would be?

The advocates of silver coinage assured us a few years ago that the remonetization of the silver dollar would be followed by a rise in the commercial price of silver, and would constrain other nations to imitate our example. The result has shown how fallacious were these predictions. And if now we proceed, on our own mere motion, to raise the mint ratio between silver and gold, we shall only open a still wider chasm between our mints and the mints of those countries which adhere to the ratio of fifteen and a half. If we wish to invite concert and not to provoke antagonism, we must work with the currents of trade and the tendencies of modern civilization, not against them.

The recommendations of the President in regard to the revival of our foreign commerce fill the least satisfactory place in his Message. Professing an assurance that the wisdom of Congress will be ready to supply whatever modifications may be necessary to make our trade and navigation laws tributary to the enlargement of our exchanges and of our carrying trade, he makes no mention of free trade in ships, but hints at subsidies in furtherance of "regular postal communications" as being measures conducive to the development of our foreign commerce and the upbuilding of our carrying trade. That is, we are first to make ship-building unprofitable by the high tariff laid on ship-building materials, and then we are to double the cost of our own blunder by paying a premium on it out of the public moneys! It is strange that men who have the wisdom of business for themselves individually should so often be unwise in their public economy.

THE ABUSES OF WILL CONTESTS.

THE decision of Surrogate Calvin sustaining the will of the late Frank Leslie naturally suggests a few remarks on the general subject of will contests, with the view of remedying existing abuses.

A contest over the estate of a decedent always awakens popular interest, and the public seems to imagine itself a self-appointed tribunal for the decision of such cases, without having the requisite knowledge of the law applicable thereto, and without any of the evidence necessary for finding the facts, except such as may be picked up from meagre newspaper reports. Add to this that there are many widespread fallacies in relation to the law, and it must be conceded that the popular verdict is most unlikely to be a correct one either in its sympathies or its judgment. One of these fallacies is that a testator cannot lawfully disinherit a child—an error probably derived from some vague ideas of the system of entailed estates in England, or the practice of some continental countries where the civil law prevails, and where the right of disposition by will is subject to some restrictions. The law in this State, however, is and has always been that a man may will his property to strangers in preference to his children, if he choose, and the only exception to his general power of disposal is the well-known provision in favor of his widow, called dower.

But while in theory this right of a testator to do as he wishes with his own is apparently unlimited, yet, owing to the facilities afforded by the law to any dissatisfied heir who may undertake to contest, the fact is that the will is frequently overruled on technical grounds, while in nearly every instance of late years where such a contest has been had the beneficiaries have only succeeded in maintaining their rights after a severe and protracted struggle, carried on at a great expense pecuniarily, to say nothing of the great damage to their feelings in the shape of undeserved notoriety, malicious aspersions and the unnecessary exposure of family matters, which are the usual stock in trade of the contestants in such cases. And for all this the law provides no remedy. In fact, until the new Code went into effect in September last the contestants could, and generally did, receive out of the estate large allowances in lieu of costs. Even though their allegations impeaching the will were held to be utterly unfounded, and while such was the law, certain lawyers could always be found ready to undertake such contests without any confidence as to the result of their efforts in the litigation, but with great confidence as to obtaining costs.

In another class of cases there has been a similar procedure based upon greater expectations, supported by the most indefensible practices. To illustrate: A man dies with a large fortune or a fair competency, acquired by his own talent and industry. He is known to the hour of death as a keen, able and successful business man. By his will he sees fit, for reasons satisfactory to himself, to discriminate in the selection of the objects of his bounty between those who have been faithful to him to the end, and those who, though of his own blood, have repaid his kindness by ingratitude and misconduct. The latter immediately after his will is made known raise for the first time the charge of insanity, and file the allegations necessary to raise that issue—not in the expectation of establishing his lunacy, but because, under the pretense of evidence on that point, such a great latitude is allowed that a man's habits, daily life and conversation for years may be inquired into, his failings brought to light, his most sacred relations with others trifled with and scandalized, to the end that those who have received his bequests and value his memory will shrink from such an ordeal, and make a compromise by giving a substantial portion to those who show conclusively by these acts that they are unworthy of it. Such cases are fresh in the minds of the public; and it is but justice to the able and conscientious judge who now fills the position of Surrogate of New York to say that he has faithfully endeavored to confine the testimony offered on such points to the most rigid rules of evidence, and to exclude all matters which could only be intended to bring reproach upon the living. The evil, however, can scarcely be remedied by legislation or judicial action. The most effective remedy is in the voice of public opinion.

The recent provision prohibiting the allowance of costs to unsuccessful contestants is only a step in the right direction. In addition to the grievances indicated, it is well known that these will contests frequently last for years, during which the estate is virtually tied up, great inconvenience and sometimes great loss ensues, yet the parties whose frivolous objections have produced these results are not compelled to make any compensation therefor. The law should be amended by providing that where the Surrogate decides that the contest was not instituted in good faith, the contestants should be liable for all the damages and expenses incurred by the other parties. Such an enactment would materially lighten the calendar of the Surrogate's Court.

Another much-needed provision would be the exercise by the Legislature of the power given by the Constitution of transferring probate cases, where questions of fact are to be determined, to the courts where the ordinary jury trials are held. There is no reason why a jury should not be as competent a tribunal to ascertain whether a testator is insane, as in the case of a murderer, or why, in the latter case, the inquiry should occupy a day or two, and in the former, a year or two. The Surrogate of New York is probably the hardest-worked judge in the country, and his business is constantly increasing. It would be an act of mercy as well as justice to him to remove mere questions of fact from his jurisdiction, leaving to him the ample field where the higher questions of law are to be determined.

A LIVE QUESTION.

THE publication of articles upon the Sunday question in the current number of two of our more prominent monthlies proves that this question has obtained a more popular hearing than ever before. It is becoming a matter of immediate interest to every man whether the Sabbath of Puritan tradition is to be retained, nominally at least, as one of our institutions, or whether the continental Sunday is to be substituted in its place, or whether, indeed, we have any use for such a thing as a day of rest at all. Side by side with this view of the question, it is noteworthy that, with the new awakening of interest in most questions in Europe, the attempt is there being made to establish what is called the English Sabbath. To this end a Sabbath Association has been formed, which is already somewhat widely spread and influential, so that it is quite among the possibilities that by such time as we shall have fairly established among us the continental Sunday, the old-fashioned New England Sabbath may have been adopted in France and Germany and Belgium.

It is not surprising that in this country the pendulum should be swinging to the side of laxity from the rigid severity of a former time, nor that in the old world it should tend towards strictness in reaction from too great license; but at this period of the world's enlightenment it surely ought to be possible so to collate the results of both experiences as from them to discover what it is that society in the present day really needs in the matter of a day of rest.

The people on the continent have evidently found something worthy of imitation in that traditional Sabbath which we are in such haste to do away with. They are trying to close the drinking-saloons, and do away with Sunday travel, and forbid Sunday work in factory and store. Experience has shown them that when men are compelled to work on Sunday they indemnify themselves first by lying idle on Monday, and that when, on the other hand, Sunday is given them as a holiday, at least half of Monday is still lost in getting over the effects of the preceding day's debauch. This is so universally the case in France, where intemperance has increased with alarming rapidity since the Franco-Prussian war, that Holy Monday has become a proverb. As for the employés upon railroads, it is found that the moral and physical deterioration consequent upon incessant work has very notably increased the risk of accident and the consequent loss of life and property. A noteworthy instance of the harm arising from unrespited labor has lately come to view in the case of the St. Gothard tunnel, where the imperative necessity of completing the work within a given time has led to its being pushed forward with no intermission for a rest-day. The result has been such a melting away of the laborers from disease and demoralization as very seriously to cripple the contractors in their undertaking. Hygienic considerations aside, it is possible that we scarcely realize the moral effect of a stated "clean-shirt day," nor how easily man may lapse into savage degradation when no recurring day of rest calls for that outward purification which is supposed to typify the inward renovation wrought by spiritual communion.

If the continental view of Sunday is found wanting when weighed in the balance of experience, it remains for those who are planning a change in the American observance of the day to devise some means of avoiding the evils which are thus plainly held up to their view. There can be no doubt that the rigid self-denial of the Puritan Sabbath is to some characters tonic and healthful, nor that the absolute rest and quiet with its opportunities for meditation, will always be exquisitely grateful to minds of a certain cast; but it is equally certain that upon the majority of characters its effects have been far from salutary. The mass of our citizens, whatever their real wants may be, are aware rather of their need of concerts and lectures, free exhibitions and cheap excursions, open halls for social intercourse and public amusement, than of opportunities for religious culture.

But since "the liberty of rest for one must be the law of rest for all," there is a difficulty, inherent in the rights of man, in providing for these felt wants, aside from the question whether, after all, the public weal is really considered by any such provision. It would seem that the settling of this perplexing question might appropriately be remitted from the political economists to the Christian Churches. For the sake of that humanity whose interests they profess to hold dearer than do other men, they are especially interested in it. With all the resources at their command, the higher enlightenment which, on the whole, belongs to them, the far-reaching philanthropy which is their professed business, and the practically unlimited funds at their disposal, it is for them to grapple with this question. We challenge them to take it up, and to provide for our people something which shall answer more nearly than anything which civilization has yet known to the highest ideal of a Sabbath which was made for man.

THE MUNICIPAL REVOLUTION.

THE downfall of Mr. John Kelly marks, as we believe, a pronounced new departure in the methods of our municipal administration. It certainly puts an end to that autocratic system under which the worst elements of the community have been arrogantly advanced to supreme control, and honorable and decent men have been largely driven from the sphere of public service. Mr. Kelly is, as we do not doubt, an honest man, but he has, by his official and political course, deliberately and continuously affronted the public sense of propriety and the whole code of political morals, and he goes to the wall at last because, in his lust of power and his overweening confidence in his peculiar methods, he forgot that a virtuous public opinion, once thoroughly aroused, is in every crisis involving great interests absolutely invincible. The men who have been promoted to official station by this latest municipal revolution are fair representatives of the better elements of the two political parties, and the public will look to them with confidence for that reform in very many directions which is almost universally felt to be an urgent necessity.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE Irish situation increases in gravity. The British Government seems paralyzed and utterly unable to cope with the energetic tactics of the Land Leaguers. Mr. Parnell, who has until now alleged that he merely aimed at a thorough revision of the land laws, has thrown off the mask, and in a recent speech made a plain declaration that what his party desired was nothing less than a complete separation from England. Under these circumstances the Government has felt obliged to do something, and it is more than probable that Mr. Parnell will be criminally indicted on a further charge. The preparations for the trial of the persons already indicted are being pushed. Mr. Gladstone has issued a circular to the members of the House of Commons, desiring their attendance in Parliament for important business, which he says will at once be proceeded with. The more influential members of the Cabinet are in favor of coercion, and such men as Lord Hartington, Lord Selborne and the Duke of Argyll are said to be anxious that some immediate repressive steps should be taken. Mr. Forster, the Secretary for Ireland, a man of advanced liberal opinions, has made up his mind that something must be done, and has issued a circular letter to the magistrates and justices of the peace, calling their attention to the fact that they have the power to commit all persons holding illegal assemblies or using unloyal words. It is also rumored that Earl Cowper, the Lord Lieutenant, has threatened to resign unless the Government adopt a more energetic policy. Meanwhile, the most shocking outrages are being perpetrated, and the reign of terrorism is practically absolute.

In Germany affairs are quiet, with the exception of the religious questions. The petition against the Jews has called forth a protest which has had greater success. In the University towns the pro-Semitic feeling is quite strong, and although there is a very great dislike throughout the country at large to the Jewish population, still it is felt that any public or official proclamation of it is wrong and against the spirit of an enlightened age. In the Prussian Diet the Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, when replying to a question of the Ultramontane leader, said that the Government very much regretted that such little progress had been made in the attempt to reconcile the differences of the Roman Catholics. He stated that the Government, by the introduction of the former Bill, had done all that lay in their power to quiet the troubles which exist with the Vatican, and that the Ultramontanes, by rejecting the Bill, had taken it out of the hands of the Government to take any further action, for they could not expose themselves to another defeat. Under these circumstances, the Government declines to interfere, and have resolved to await further developments.

In Europe the finance question is once more coming to the front. The extraordinary strides that the United States have made in material prosperity during the last few years, and the enormous supplies of provisions which have been shipped from here to the other side of the Atlantic, cause a severe drain upon the treasuries of the Old World. In France this drain has been so great as to call for some Governmental interference, and M. Maguin, the Minister of Finance, being questioned by M. Soubeyran acknowledged that there was a diminution in the stock of gold consequent upon an adverse balance of trade. The Minister stated that he was prepared to advance the rate of discount of the Bank of France, and to put into circulation bank notes for sums below one hundred francs. M. Soubeyran called attention to the further drain which the redemption of the debt of the United States would bring about, and advised the Government to begin negotiations with Germany and the United States. It was also pointed out that the decision of the Monetary Conference, some years ago in Paris, left the door open for a bi-metallic currency. Another disturbing element is to be found in the Bill now before the Italian Parliament for redeeming Italy's forced paper currency. The Bill in its present shape has been favorably received, but it is generally admitted that several important alterations must be made. The paper currency was introduced into Italy in 1866, at a time when the Italo-Prussian alliance had just been concluded. Italy had engaged to make war upon Austria, and her funds were selling as low as forty-eight. The Finance Minister found that money could not be borrowed at any price, and the only available means was to contract a loan with the National Government and thus issue a forced paper currency. This was successfully accomplished, and Italian manufacturers have been enabled to compete with the rest of the world even when gold was at a premium of ten and fifteen per cent. It is now found that by abolishing the paper currency a large saving will be made, and that the finances will be placed upon a more sound footing. In Russia, also, there is a movement on foot for financial reform. M. Banque has been appointed Vice-Minister of Finance, and as he is a well-known political economist and an excellent practical financier, it is hoped that he will be able to invent some method by which the daily depreciation of the ruble can be stopped. The annual importations into Russia exceed 500,000,000 rubles, and the exports are scarcely 300,000,000 rubles. Yet Russia is one of the richest countries in the world, and an active and wise administration of her finances ought to work marvels.

Another movement likely to prove interesting to Americans are the present agricultural changes in Egypt. During our civil war the exportation of cotton was enormous and at paying prices. But of late years, it has turned out that even the yearly addition to the soil of the country by the inundation of the Nile has proved inadequate to support the exhaustion of an annual crop of cotton. There is in Egypt an excellent field for American products, but there is no cargo which can be returned. An attempt is now being made to grow jute, which is extensively used here, and it looks as if America will soon find another market for her wares, taking jute in exchange.

THE Vermont Legislature has passed a prohibitory liquor law of a very stringent character. The Act makes any place where liquor is sold or given away, or where gambling is allowed, a nuisance; provides that the place shall be closed, and holds the keeper liable to fine and imprisonment. Such a law can scarcely fail to exterminate the traffic at which it is aimed, if backed by a vigorous public opinion.

THE subscriptions in Europe to the Panama Canal scheme are said to have been a complete success, exceeding the total amount of shares offered, so that a considerable reduction will be made to the subscribers in the allotment. The subscriptions in this city are reported at $5,000,000. It is said that Secretary of the Navy Thompson will accept the presidency of the Canal Company. The effectual conservation of American interests on the Isthmus will be the subject of a conference between the Secretary and the House Naval Committee.

THE first Bill introduced in the House of Representatives, on the opening day of the session, was one for an appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee River. All measures of this sort should be closely scanned. Of the 2,000 Bills now on the calendar of the House, a large majority involve schemes and jobs of one sort and another. Millions are asked for internal improvements of various kinds, and for public buildings. The House should set itself sternly against all legislation of this sort. There should be no expenditure of public money for any purpose not actually demanded by the public interests.

AMONG the subjects which will no doubt command attention at the present session of Congress is that of inter-State commerce, which attained a good deal of prominence in the last Congress. It is believed that on a square vote there will be found a majority in both Houses in favor of the naked proposition that Congress undoubtedly has the right to regulate commerce between the States. Any Bill which avoids unjust discriminations will probably have a hearty support. With the great influence of the railroad corporations arrayed against it, Reagan's Inter-State Commerce Bill was defeated in the Commerce Committee by only three votes, and two of the members who voted against the Bill did so, not because they were in favor of the principle per se, but because they favored a modification of the Bill.

THE appointment of Colonel William B. Hazen as Chief Signal Officer of the Army is not the best that could have been made. Indeed, it is difficult to understand upon what possible ground it can be justified. The natural and proper thing for the President to have done was to have nominated some officer who has been connected with the service from the start, and who is fairly entitled to promotion by efficiency and fidelity in the performance of his duties. The meteorological work of this Bureau is a specialty, and is withal so important and its extension so desirable, that the highest qualifications should have been sought in the successor of its founder, General Myer; and it seems like an insult to competent and trained officials to boost into his place, over their heads, a person whose only recommendation seems to lie in the fact that he is able to control certain political and army influences in his own behalf, without reference to the interests of the public service. The Philadelphia Times well expresses the general estimate of this nomination when it says:

"It is not at all likely that any one will have the presumption to set up a claim that the appointment was made on its merits, since General Hazen is not known to have the first qualification for the place, and there are many well-equipped from whom the choice could and should have been made. It is singularly ludicrous that on the day when the President was lecturing the country on the subject of civil service reform, which is presumed to mean the filling of positions with those best fitted for them, he should have made such an appointment as this. It baffles every idea of civil service reform. General Hazen is one of those fortunately not very common army officers whose business has chiefly been to hang about the places of power for something comfortable, and such have the most unaccountable facilities, regardless of civil service reform, for getting the places which they should not have."

THE Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, recommends the issue of a bond bearing not more than 3.65 per cent. interest, and redeemable after fifteen years, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of bonds redeemable on or before July 1st, 1881. The Ways and Means Committee of the House has done better than this, and by a unanimous vote has agreed to substitute 3 per cent. for 3½ per cent., the rate of interest fixed in the Wood Bill for refunding the maturing bonds. Some members of the committee express the belief that a 2 per cent. bond can be floated just as successfully as a 3 per cent., and amendments to the proposed Bill may be offered to this effect. Mr. Kelley will present an amendment in the nature of a substitute to provide for the gradual payment of the debt from the surplus revenues of the Government.

OCEAN telegraphy has attained an extent and scope which the projectors of the system could scarcely have foreseen. The length of different cables, in nautical miles, is thus stated in a recent publication: Anglo-American (Ireland to Newfoundland) 1,850 miles, and from Newfoundland to Sydney, N. S.) over 300 miles, a total distance of about 2,150 for each of its three cables; the Anglo-French cable from Brest (by way of St. Pierre) to Duxbury, about 3,329 miles; the Direct United States cable from Ireland to Torbay and from Torbay to Rye Beach, 2,360 miles; and the new French cable from Brest to Louisburg, 2,430 miles; from St. Pierre to Cape Cod, 880 miles, and from Brest to Penzance, 151 miles; a total length of about 3,461 miles. Two new Atlantic cables, which it is now proposed to lay, will each add 2,400 miles to the system. These cables, when laid, are to be operated in connection with the land lines of the American Union Telegraph Company.

NO CLASS of men in the public service are entitled to higher consideration for fidelity and efficiency than the surfmen attached to the life saving crews on the Atlantic coast. It is pleasant to find that the Government recognizes this fact, and is disposed to honor the men who so often peril their lives in the service of others. The members of one of the crews on the New Jersey coast have just received gold medals in recognition of their splendid daring during one of the terrible storms of last Winter, and the precedent will, no doubt, be followed in other cases, and the tone of the service thereby generally improved. The crews on the New Jersey coast are all composed of picked surfmen, upon whom the terrors of the sea in its angriest moods have no influence whatever when duty calls them to do and dare.

SOME interesting facts as to the negro exodus were given by Governor St. John of Kansas in a recent interview. He states that the emigration from the South continues without diminution, about seventy-five per cent. of the emigrants locating in Kansas. For the most part, they are self-sustaining, only 500 of the 40,000 who have gone into the State being now in receipt of assistance. Governor St. John says: "When once they get off of the relief associations' hands they never come back, and many of them get homes of their own within two years. In my judgment the exodus of the negro from the South is a movement of greater importance than is generally attached to it. It may end in the complete demoralization of labor in the South. The Southern whites have got to give them protection or they will move North. I have no doubt that many now in Kansas would return to their old Southern homes if they were guaranteed protection to life, money and their elective franchise."

THE Mormons are displeased with the suggestions of the President's Message in reference to their "peculiar institution." The Gentile organs, on the contrary, are delighted with the proposition to have Congress revoke a clause of the Act organizing the Territory and to govern the Territory in a way which shall compel obedience to the laws of the United States. One of these papers says:

"The Mormon sect in Utah has increased until they have become a menace to free institutions in the West. Perjury is taught as a virtue when necessary to evade laws, and a system as despotic and as slavish as ever prevailed in Mohammedan countries is swiftly becoming a tremendous power here. The truth is, the time has come for vigorous measures. It is as certain as anything in the world that were polygamy abandoned nine out of every ten Mormon women in Utah would praise God. Polygamy has imbruted men enough and broken the hearts of women enough to justify any means to destroy it. Hence we rejoice at the President's words, and shall look after Congress to see whether hereafter the corruption fund of the Mormon Church can prevail any more in Congress or not. The plan suggested is a legal one, easily effected, and the only peaceable one."

"BEING BLIND, I NOW SEE."

CHAPTER I.—A MORNING POST.

"ONLY one, and that one blind! Good heavens, how sad? Here, Joan. I want you. Come and read this. That's the end of all the dreams you've been dreaming, wife! No, be off, little ones," as two bonnie girls of six and seven trotted up like faithful pages of the house-queen; "let your mother stay with me alone."

"What is it, Francis?" said the wife, who was chief councilor, friend, helper, but not master of every member of the "Elizabeth's" household. "Nothing amiss with Geoff, is there?" as her fears flew off at a tangent to the one absent member of the family now in his second term of university perils. "Oh, then, with a sigh of relief as her husband shook his head, "give me the letter, dear—or letters are they, and from Australia? Why," excitedly, "it's from your Cousin Hugh! Oh, is he coming back? How strange the letter we've looked for so anxiously should come this morning, just when I wasn't thinking of it!"

"Read it, Joan, or, rather, read them to me, if you can. Poor Hugh—poor fellow!"

"Why poor Hugh, Francis? He isn't dead?"

"Read me the letters, Joan; that," pointing to one scarcely legible page—"that is all I had glanced at when I called you."

Not one, but half a dozen sheets of paper, different in size and bearing different writing, lay on the table when Mrs. Beresford had emptied the large many stamped envelope of its contents.

Taking first the one her husband had pointed out, she read, growing tearful and tremulous as she went on:

"NEW SOUTH WALES, July 12th, 18—.

"DEAR FRANK—Three days ago your business budget came out to me. Just in time to be of no use. It's all up with me; the poor brute I was riding was not to blame, though. We might have had good times together if I'd lived, but I'm bound in another direction, and shall see the old place no more. We were always good friends, old fellow. You will take care of my"—there came a great blur upon the paper here, and the failing hand had scarce found strength to trace the remaining lines—"my boy. He's the only one left, the eldest too, but he's blind. He has his mother's face; be good to him, pray be very"—and there the message from their dying kinsman ended in a scarcely decipherable "H. V. B." painfully scrawled, as the next-read letter told them, "just afore the poor gentleman went off, which he did very comfortable and easy-like, fancyin' his wife, as had been dead these five years, was settlin' by his side. And the horse, what he was so fond of, is just sold to a butcher. The beast was that fond of his master it would follow him like a dog, and when they found Mr. Beresford it was standin' by him, droopin' its head over him, and makin' hummerin' noises as if it wanted some one to help him."

"Poor old Hugh," broke in Francis Beresford, "just the same to the end! There wasn't a horse or a dog on the place yonder that didn't love him. How his life has been thrown away! Go on, Joan." His hand stole over his eyes as his wife finished the landlady's letter, which in its turn commended to these unknown gentlefolks the blind child whom she had grown to love.

"For he's as gentle as a little lady, and his poor father was as careful of him as if he was a lord. Rough it himself he would, and didn't care, but rough it the little one shouldn't—and there wasn't a better boy in all the colony than this one, and that his new friends would be kind to him would be the humble hope of their obedient servant,

"SARAH TOMB."

The other papers were a printed extract from the local journal giving a brief notice of Mr. Beresford's death "from an accident caused by his horse stumbling in a rough spot known as 'Green's Gully'"; a form, attested by doctor and clergyman, of the death and burial; and an informal but perfectly legal document, in the handwriting of the said clergyman, signed by the dying man, bequeathing all his worldly possessions to his only child, of whom his cousin, Francis Beresford, was made sole guardian. One more brief letter explained that the goods left by the deceased had been quickly sold to defray the expenses of his funeral and to discharge his few debts, leaving a balance sufficient to pay the passage money home for his child in the Sea King, which vessel would sail about the 3d of August, and might be expected in England any time after the second week in October.

This ended the communication, listened to in dead silence by Francis Beresford.

His wife watched him as he rose and paced the room, not caring to speak lest she should disturb the many recollections roused by this morning's news—recollections of the time, five-and-twenty years before, when he and this Cousin Hugh had been fast friends and almost brothers; when the old squire, their uncle, was living in full strength and health yonder at Kingsbrooke, caring for little in life beyond a good hunting season and the constant companionship of one or the other of his nephews. Ah, as he stood there by his study-window, could he see the old house that had been to him and Hugh as a home, standing out from its background of many-tented Autumn woods, gray and turreted, and out of date, but comelier in his eyes than any modern dwelling, and the memory of the old free, careless days came back, when the future had seemed to be filled with brightness, and trouble was as remote as the Arctic regions!

But into these regions had they plunged, and lost for ever their Summer-time of happy early manhod.

Hugh fell in love, and, alas, with the wrong woman! She might be well-born—indeed, in that point, there was little difference between the lovers—and she might be pretty; no one who looked at her sweet, fair face could deny that fact; and though she was practically poor, that, under other circumstances, need have been a matter of no moment; but the great offense was, that she was not of the squire's choosing, and in so important an affair as the choice of a wife for his eldest nephew and successor at Kingsbrooke, the old man was determined to make his influence felt.

Unreasonable, of course. Altogether miscalculating his power over his heir.

Hugh, furious at this, almost the first check he had known in any strong desire, turned a deaf ear to his cousin's advice, scorned prudence or patience as cowardly and unmanly virtues altogether beneath his lofty ideas of honor, bade his love to wait till he had made her a home across the sea, and with his heart full of bitterness went out from his boyhood's home, swearing never to return till his uncle should have repented and acknowledged his mistake.

Fancy that! The old man, who was the very soul of conservatism and obstinacy, repenting of anything, acknowledging himself in the wrong in any possible matter!

"Oh, Hugh, it was Greek against Greek," muttered Francis Beresford as he thought of these things; ay, and the tug-of-war broke off half the ties that had made the happiness of the elder man's life. He might ride, and he might hunt, and keep his four-footed friends about him; and he might still have in the one nephew who remained by him some one whose companionship pleased, whose interests occupied him; but with Hugh's exodus had gone forth, too his power of enjoying what was left him; thenceforth, though he carried himself bravely before men, the squire's days went heavily.

And Hugh, to the full as obstinate, every whit as proud, refused all pleading of his cousin to return, refused the income offered through Francis, refused everything reasonable, never caring to realize the blank he had left in the old house. Hugging his pride, he struggled on in the wild southern colony where he had elected to try his fortune, while his faithful love wore out her youth and grew into faded middle-age before he could write and call her to the home he had at last made for her.

Twelve years of waiting, four years of wedded life, and then these two were parted by a stronger hand than their angry kinsman's. In his rare communication with his cousin, Hugh had spoken of two children being taken from him; an Australian paper alone had borne the news of his wife's death, since when no word had come from him, and the letters which told him of his uncle's death and the inheritance ready for him when he came to claim it had traveled in more than one wrong direction before they reached him in the new township where he had finally settled.

"And then," said Francis Beresford, still gazing wistfully at the old house in the hazy distance, "and then he lay dying, and his one boy is blind!"

He said it bitterly in spite of himself. A hand stole on his arm, and the voice by him said, ever so softly:

"We must make the little one happy when he comes to us! We must——"

"We must smooth the road for the rich and young, while we must plod along with our burdens on our backs; is that it, Joan?"

"Perhaps. But listen, Frank, dear. Don't let us think of our own disappointment; you know, when we've been talking about it all over we never felt certain that Hugh had no children; we only——"

"We only hoped it, eh, Joan? Well, hopes and uncertainties are done away with now; we must face our difficulties, such as they are, for there's no Hugh at hand to help us. Maud must get married with as little fuss as may be, and Geoff must knock off half his fancies at Cambridge. This poor little blind child inherits what he can never fully enjoy, and spoils the lives of those who are expected to be his best friends. Oh, it's a queer world!"

Disappointed in their uncle's legacy they had undoubtedly been; startled at the sum total of the small debts that her husband had allowed to accumulate, she had been; doubly disappointed both of them, when all their hopes of help from Hugh had been so suddenly dashed; and yet, as the wife set forth with infinite pains, leaning over her husband's chair, and caressing the short brown curls as yet unstreaked by gray, "and yet everything will come right. You will see how I will plan and manage now I know exactly what it is we owe. You need not be troubled, Francis dear; only set to work to think how you can do your best for this poor lad who is coming. Our children have us, you know; so they are, after all, much richer than he is!"

With that and a kiss upon the thick brown hair, she left him.

CHAPTER II.—A STRANGE HOME-COMING.

UNSETTLED and somewhat troubled days followed that important morning's post. Geoff, albeit a reasonable young fellow in the main, rebelled a little at the order for retrenchment that went forth. "If neither my father nor myself is ever likely to come in for Kingsbrooke," he wrote, "I suppose I shall have to live chiefly on my wits, and I should have thought the money paid for my coach wouldn't have been thrown away. I never can grind much alone. And I shall miss 'Highflyer' awfully. I do think if I take the set of rooms over mine (they are lots cheaper, and not so very much worse than these), and work away like a brick by myself, you might coax my father into letting me keep my old horse. Only you needn't worry yourself, mother; I'll try and pull your way, if you say I must."

As with Geoff, so with his sister Maud, whose coming marriage with a neighboring clergyman had absorbed most of the feminine interest of the household for weeks past. The costlier items of her trousseau were ruthlessly pruned away, leaving her, as she said, regretfully, "an outfit no better than a farmer's daughter's."

"And indeed, Maud," said her mother, a little hurt by this speech, "why should you claim anything better? Except in the accident of your being what is called well-born, you are in no way superior to plenty of girls round about us. Your poor uncle's tenant at the Mill Farm gave his daughter a much grander wedding than we can give you now; but if you can ease your father and me by giving up these things, you won't mind, will you, darling?"

Then the pretty bride-elect protested that to please her mother she would go and be married in a lilac print gown, and the mother, whose pangs had been many over the sacrifice of every item, brought forth some of the greatest treasures of her own wardrobe, supplementing the careful purchases of homelier things with gifts of lace that a duchess might have coveted, and sundry quaint jewels that twinkled and sparkled as though they were living creatures, and could tell their histories if they so willed.

Thus the love of these young people lightened Mrs. Beresford's cares, and took the sting out of many an uncongenial task.

But the bright sun of contentment that dispersed or gilded the clouds about her had the same happy effect on her husband only when she, its medium, was at hand.

At other times Mr. Beresford fell into the uncomfortable and unwise habit of ruminating over his troubles, among which their present pecuniary difficulty, the setting straight of which occupied his wife's healthy energies, seemed almost the least.

"Kingsbrooke" would never be his. It would never be Geoff's; and he little knew how entirely he had calculated on some day owning it until it was completely lost to him. Hugh's proud concealment of his blind child's existence he looked on in the light of a personal injury; and with all the wrong-headedness of an angry man, he blamed every person but the right one for his disappointment.

The right one being himself. For might not Hugh—his elder only by two or three years—might not Hugh have returned, and if childless have married again, and had more children? Or might he not, the entail ceasing with him, have chosen to sell the place, or divide it, or leave it to some other than this aggrieved kinsman?

In his neighbors' affairs Francis Beresford was clear headed to a degree. There was not a man more liked, more generally consulted on matters public or domestic, more thoroughly trusted than himself for miles around, and yet in his own case he had made this stupid blunder; he had let himself drift into the idea of coming ownership till that idea had become part of his life; and when it was taken from him, he felt as much robbed as if a thief had walked off with his purse before his very eyes.

So the outcome of his self communings was that he announced his intention of going off to Liverpool early in the week following the receipt of the Australian letters.

"Anything is better than stopping about here waiting for a telegram from the captain. You don't know, my poor Joan, what these days have been to me. Every time I stir out somebody pities me. That old ass, Peter Burton, nearly put me in a rage this morning up at the brick-field. How? Why, he kept saying, 'And so Master Hugh is gone; and haven't you got the place now, Master Francis?' (You know the poor old fellow always talks as if we were boys still.) 'Well, I'm sorry for you, that I am; you'd ha' bin the right man in the right place, you would, after the many years you've bin a'most the same as master!' Joan, I know it's abominable of me, but upon my honor it was all I could do to keep from swearing at him!"

"Poor Peter! If wishes could make you into the squire, Peter's wish would soon work the change! But, Frank dear, you are quite right; it will be much best for you to be ready to meet the poor boy, it's much the kindest thing you can do; and when you bring him safely back, why, you'll be so busy settling everything about him with Mr. Thornton, that you will never remember these trifles."

So soothing him by every possible little artifice, Mrs. Beresford pressed forward the arrangements for her husband's journey, and herself drove him to the station, four miles distant, on the following morning.

This was Tuesday, and not until the Thursday morning could Mrs. Beresford receive a letter from her husband, but on that morning came the expected missive, telling them that the Sea King had been passed by an American steamer, and might be looked for within four-and-twenty hours. Within a few minutes of this came a telegram dated 6 A. M. the same day, with the words, "Just off the landing-stage. Sea King in with the morning tide. Send to the station for the 9:30 train to-night."

After that the hours of the day lagged heavily, and excitement and expectancy were wrought to the highest pitch when the wheels of the dogcart were heard coming up the drive. But conceive the disappointment and almost dismay with which the groom's message was received:

"The train came in all right enough, ma'am, but master wasn't there nowhere. The guard said he was sure he hadn't got in at Liverpool Street, for there wasn't many passengers, and he knows he'd have noticed him. Which, of course, he would," finished James, who could not imagine the possibility of his master being unknown to any right-minded official between home and London. So there was nothing to be done by the household but to go to rest and wait the next day's trains.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the country the Sea King had arrived, and among its living freight had put ashore a tall, slim lad, whose refined, delicate features, the very image of his patient mother's, had instantly pointed him out to Francis Beresford as the charge he had come to seek.

At the first sound of his voice—"You are young Hugh Beresford, are you not?" he had said—the boy's color deepened, the long brown lashes fell over his dark, sightless eyes.

"You speak like——"

"Like——?"

"Like my father!" said the poor lad, with a sob, and clung with both hand to his cousin's arm.

Francis quivered as the boy hung on him. What would he have given to have been able to welcome this lonely boy with the warmth he longed for, to tell him he had something of his father's heart as well as his father's voice, to bid him cheer up, for there was a plenty of love and care waiting for him at the end of his day's journey.

But for the life of him he could not do it. His words of greeting came coldly and awkwardly from his lips, and he was glad to release his arm, and, leaving the lad in safe hands, to hurry after the removal of his few belongings.

As began, so went on the day. At the hotel breakfast he pressed food upon young Hugh, and put a few disjointed questions about the voyage. The time that had preceded it he dared not touch upon; for he had all a man's horror of tears, and had found out that safety from them only lay in silence as to the past.

"When we get home you will be all right," was the nearest approach to a comforting speech he found himself able to make, and even that was suggested by the decided impression, as the day wore on, that he himself should know no ease till he was safe into the same haven.

"What home am I going to?" asked the boy, half-timidly, and the deprecatory manner and slightly shrinking figure of the returning heir stung his cousin with a touch of self-reproach.

Here was he, known as the readiest friend and helper to every man, rich or poor, about him, letting an orphan, desolate altogether but for him, come into a strange land and ask what was to be his home!

"Why, you are coming to 'Elizabeth's,' of course," he answered, and at the kinder voice the boy drew nearer to him. "My wife will be looking for us by evening time. No, it is not evening yet; we're not reached London yet, and then there will be stations to change and forty miles further to travel." "And then," thought Mr. Beresford, and he frowned, with the old angry look of the last few days back on his face—"and then I shall take back the owner of the place he will never understand or value, and have to play henchman or steward to my young squire till I'm an old man. Ugh!"

He vented his final grumble out loud, and young Hugh asked him if he were very tired.

"I am," he said; "this thing shakes so. And the ship was dreadful. Oh, the noises and the men talking! I hated it; I never could sleep for the noises, you know, and—thinking. When I get home I shall be so tired I shall sleep for days and nights, I believe."

Indeed, on their arrival at London, the lad had just dropped off into an uneasy slumber, and in the hurry and confusion of a sudden awakening, amid the many strange sounds and jostlings of a crowded platform, contrived to lose his hold of his cousin's coat-sleeve, and be lost among the busy throng that pressed about him.

Then, discovering his absence in a few moments, Mr. Beresford had an anxious ten minutes' search for him, finding him at last, the very picture of silent terror, clinging tight to a lamp-post, evidently fast losing what little nerve he possessed.

"Good heavens! how you frightened me," cried his cousin, almost angrily. "Here, keep tight hold of me now. Porter, a cab. Sit there till I get your things together.

But that was no easy matter. While seeking for the luggage the boy had got lost, and while hunting for the boy the luggage had vanished, more time was wasted in giving orders, and then, to crown all, when Liverpool Street Station was reached, their train had departed a quarter of an hour before.

Wisdom said, "Go to an hotel and go to sleep," but a strong desire possessed Francis Beresford to get home that night somehow, and when he found that the mail-train would be starting a couple of hours later, by that he determined they would go.

By that, after the most wearisome waiting he had ever known, they went, reaching Colford some half hour after midnight, and finding, as might have been expected, no carriage, no vehicle of any kind to take them on to their destination.

"Why hadn't he telegraphed to his servant who was waiting there for the 9:30 train?" Why, because he never gave it a thought, taking it for granted that the man would wait for him. Now there was nothing to be done but to stand about till a fly could be got from the nearest inn, or—— "But that wouldn't be possible, Hugh," cried Mr. Beresford, as the idea struck him. "You're too tired, are you not—or could you walk home?"

"Oh, yes!" was the eager answer. "Anything to get us there quickly. I can rest!—oh, how I can rest when we get there! Do let us walk!"

Without more ado, then, in this fashion, and at this strange hour, the young heir set off on his first journey over his own lands. A brilliant full moon made the path round the outskirts of the town, and through the field beyond, as easy traveling as the high-road itself, and Mr. Beresford repeated more than once that it was as light as day, forgetting how little difference that made to his hearer. "I've come over the fields," he said, when they had gone full half an hour on their way, "because it saves us a long round; we have gone the best part of our way now. We are coming toward the brickfields. This is Kingsbrooke, Hugh!" The boy stooped short.

"This is Kingsbrooke, is it?" he said. "This land is mine, Cousin Francis!" bringing both hands together round his companion's arm with a tight, nervous grip. "You don't mind my coming home, do you? You are not angry with me for having the place instead of you, are you?"

Strange and unlucky question! The pathos of his voice touched no kindly responding chord in his hearer. All through that strange, silent walk a very demon of desire had been grappling with Francis Beresford's better self; a dozen voices seemed chanting in his ears, "Instead of you, instead of you!" And now the boy had clinging to him, read his thoughts and put the self same question that had driven him half-wild through that long day.

There on the hillside was the white house, silvered along its broad front by the clear moonlight: away over the bridge was his own far smaller home, the modest dower-house of a bygone Beresford, which would have to be his to the end of his days; and here, all alone with him, trusting to his guidance for his every footstep—good heavens, what put that thought into his brain just then! All alone with him—all alone with him—was the one young life that stood between him and his desires.

"You are not angry, are you?" repeated the voice, half-sadly, and Mr. Beresford almost gasped for breath for words to deny the suggestion even, but the right words wouldn't come. Instead:

"Let us make haste," he almost whispered; "you must never speak like that, my boy; be quick, we are coming to the brook now! Hold me tight: hold me very tight; take hold of the rail with your other hand."

They were crossing the stream now, the broad band of living light that ran at the base of the brickfields between bare willow-branches on to the mill-dam half a mile away; crossing steadily and safely till midway on the planks. Then what was it? Did the boy slip or lose his footing? Francis Beresford could swear he never touched or loosed his hand: but in one awful moment young Hugh stumbled, and with a cry, "Oh, help me!" fell heavily into the swift-flowing waters beneath.

CHAPTER III.—"A ROD FOR A FOOL'S BACK."

THE stillness of death followed that one cry, and the stillness of death seemed to have seized on the one man who heard it. For full fifteen minutes, there stood the figure on the bridge, motionless as if a man of stone.

Was it the grip of some outward and visible demon held him there, that he never moved his eyes from the spot below whence the pale, upturned face had floated swiftly away? Had some very devil incarnate bound his hands, that never a muscle had stirred when the voice cried, "Help me"? What awful power, what strange paralysis, took possession of brain and heart, and clothed those minutes with a dream-like unreality that slowly faded when, as from a swoon, at last he roused.

Roused! Woke! What was it? Were the bells ringing for the boy's return (it was only St. Margaret's chimes from the distant town), and what were the voices around him. "It's yours—Kingsbrooke is yours." A very chorus seemed to fill the air about him.

Shivering, cowering like a dog let loose from the hand of a master who has beaten him, Francis Beresford unclasped his hands from the bridge-rail, and lifted his crouching form to meet the horrible wave of returning consciousness.

"Kingsbrooke is yours?"

"Leave off, leave off!" he cried, stretching out two shaking arms as if to fence away a mortal foe, and an echo from the thick plantations on the hillside mocked him with his own words.

"Kingsbrooke is ——" No, no, it was young Hugh's, the boy's—the boy's. "Where is he?" And again the cruel echo mocked him. "Where is he?" cried the air goblin. "Where is he?" he whispered with dry, cold lips; and out of the wild turmoil of his breast came back the answer:

"He is dead."

And quite far away gibing voices went out chanting, "Kingsbrooke is yours. Yours, Francis Beresford, yours!"

"Never, never!" he almost shouted. "God help me, it shall never be mine!" and, wresting himself from the delusions his envious soul had cast about him, he tore like a madman up the white path to the only cottage in sight, and besought the inmates to come out and help him.

"Some one was drowning in the stream; for heaven's sake, come!"

But never a sound replied, for the place was as tenantless as the fields outside. Fulcher and all his brood of children might be there the very next day, but on that night they were taking their heavy slumbers at the further end of the village. The seconds of waiting were few, but they lagged like hours. Then the truth flashed upon him. Empty! And alone, hurrying, trembling from head to foot, he made his way back to the stream, and, knee-deep in water, waded on from willow to willow, holding on to the slender branches, peering into the deep pools, calling aloud: "Boy! Hugh! answer me! For pity's sake, speak!"

On through the mud and rushes till he neared the mill—past there it would be vain to search—groping vainly from post to post, the clear, tender moonlight lending its help in every nook and cranny: but all in vain! Once more St. Margaret's chimes rang out, and at every stroke Francis Beresford's heart lost hope. He knew now that in some deep spot lay the child he should have guarded—he knew that Kingsbrooke was verily his, but that he and peace had parted company for ever. Slowly he dragged himself up the bank, numb and despairing.

Into the oak plantation close by he plunged, terrifying with steps unusual a multitude of four-footed creatures who, on fun or food intent, were abroad this lovely night. Not till he reached a keeper's hut did he once stop to rest and think.

To think! How dared he think when every thought was torment, every moment recalled filled him with horror, every moment to come would but cover him with dishonor!

Who would believe that it was all a chance? Nay, was it chance? And then, what power of earth or hell had kept him back, when a spring, an outstretched arm, would have saved the child?

Over and over that miserable, self-condemning track his pitiless conscience dragged him, bringing him ever face to face with the accusation that burnt into his soul: "You wished him dead!"

He had wished him dead, though till this moment the unholy thought had never shaped itself in honest words.

"Good God!" he muttered, and fell a-trembling like the brown leaves over his head.

And this loved husband, this trusted friend, this man of gentle birth, and, save in this one great trial, of gentle heart, worthy the love he owned, sat through the solitude of the now darkening wood with that one thought driving him close on to madness.

The sin he had fostered had taken shape, and hunted him down into an abyss of humiliation and misery unutterable.

Its stupor was closing round him like a pall when, close by, the bass whir-r-r of a pheasant's flight startled him, and opening his heavy eyes once more upon the outer life, lo! the pink flush of dawn was stealing through the trees, another day was waiting for the world.

Then, cramped from this wretched vigil, chilled to the very bone, Mr. Beresford rose up and turned his face homeward.

Through the golden bracken and thick underwood, all laden with the heavy night dews, heedless of bough and branch and thorns, of all that lay between him and home; on he went, clearing the wood, and standing in the open field at last. For a moment he paused. There yonder was the roof that covered his best-beloved, and a rush of passionate emotion half-choked him.

"God bless them! God help me!" he groaned, and even as he uttered the words, help came.

"Mr. Beresford, sir!"

It was old Peter Burton shouting to him, beckoning him towards his cottage, a little bit of a dwelling-place just on the outskirts of the wood.

Mr. Beresford stared, scarcely comprehending the call, and would have gone his own way, but Peter cried again, moving towards his doorway as he did so.

"Come along, sir! Come here, Master Francis; make haste, sir!"

Bright firelight was gleaming through the cottage window; the door stood wide open; in the inner room, Peter, anxious of face, clad in his clay-bespattered garments, stooped over something that lay upon his own poor bed.

Over something, some one. Oh, was the sight a cruel mockery, was this a dream, or had God, as by a miracle, given him back his life, his home?

For there, sleeping as peacefully as a baby, two hands that had not yet lost the dimpled grace of childhood clasped above his head, lay young Hugh Beresford, and at the sight, his kinsman fell upon his knees, speechless with joy.

As on a deaf man's ear fell Peter's low-toned explanations, and it was some minutes before he could make clear to his hearer his own share of the night's work.

"They bricks," he was saying, for the third time, when Mr. Beresford first noticed he was speaking. "was wonderful awk'ard. I'd counted on finishin' off the batch 'fore supper-time, and gittin' to my bed like a Christian man; but two of my men got off drinkin' in the day, and that hindered me, and the one I reckoned on leavin' just to put in the last two lots o' coals, he never turned up at the time he ought, and so I had to finish up my own self. And I grumbled over it. I don't wish to conceal nothin', and that's the truth; grumble I did. But there, the Almighty knows what we're arter a deal better than we know ourselves, and it wasn't wholly to please his own self, you may depend on it, that Fulcher kept out o' the way! Well, sir, when I was just crawlin' up home somewhere in the small hours, which I did, takin' a short cut through the trees and out by the water, what should I hear, but the water-fowl bustlin' about. 'Snares!' thinks I. 'Poachers!' says I, to myself: 'but you ain't a-goin' to have it all to yourself, my man, whoever you are!' So I just creeped down in the shades o' them big polled ash, and when I got by the water-edge what should I see but little master there," nodding his head at the sleeping boy, "drifted right up by that old willow that leans out over the stream, with his arms spread out and his white face bobbin' up and down for all the world like one of Miss Olive's white ducks she's so fond of!"

"And then, Peter?"

"Why, then, you may depend on it, sir, I out with him pretty quick; and I do believe I dragged him heels up'ards right here to my own door. Carry him I couldn't—he's a great grown lad for all he's got a girl's face—an' I stripped him and rolled him up in the thickest blanket I'd got, and I made a fire fit to roast a bullock, and rubbed and turned him about, till presently he give a sigh like and opened his poor eyes, and I knew he was all right."

"And did he speak?"

"He just said, 'Never mind, Cousin Francis; it was all my own fault not holding to you tight.' And he said that over, sort of sleeping-like, and then he went right off as sound as a bell, and so he've kept ever since. I dursn't leave him for fear he should wake and find himself, alone; and what's more, though I never meant to, what should I do but go right off as sound as him, and never open my stupid old eyes till half an hour ago! I was just rubbin' myself awake out by the door, when I see you come up from the wood, and I thought in a minute what a night you'd had of it; for, of course, after he spoke, I knew well enough who he was. Why, Master Francis, I do believe you've been in the water yourself!" eying the wet, mud-covered clothes of his hearer.

"Water!" cried Mr. Beresford, aloud. "I've been through a very furnace of trouble, Peter, I——"

"Cousin!"

The boy was waking, raising himself up, stretching his hands forth, his helplessness entreating some one's care and pity. In a moment he was gathered up in strong arms, close to the heart which vowed henceforth to be his friend, his very slave through life.

* * * * * *

Long years of patient care and almost womanly tenderness have been the fruit of that night's terrors. No more longing after Kingsbrooke now, except to make it worthy of its master, and the master fitted for his place.

His every deed and word testify to the truth of his repentance, and the rest lies between him and One who knows all secrets. Requiescat!

TAMMANY'S WATERLOO.

FRIDAY, December 10th, witnessed a most complete revolution in offices in New York City, and Tammany Hall sustained a signal defeat. The question of the reappointment of John Kelly as Comptroller had exercised all circles for many days. When the Aldermen met in their Chamber to act upon the nominations of Mayor Cooper, not only all the available space of the hall, but the corridors and steps of the City Hall, were densely packed with politicians and others. The Republican Aldermen uniting with the Irving Hall Democrats and four Tammany Aldermen, put out of office Comptroller John Kelly, John Wheeler, President of the Tax Department; Park Commissioner James F. Wenman, Excise Commissioners George W. Morton and Philip Merkle, and Police Justices Patrick G. Duffy and F. Sherman Smith; and by votes varying from 17 to 4 to 13 to 8 confirmed Mayor Cooper's nominations of Allan Campbell, an Irving Hall Democrat, for Comptroller; Hubert O. Thompson, an Irving Hall Democrat, for Commissioner of Public Works; William C. Whitney, an Irving Hall Democrat, for Corporation Counsel; Maurice J. Power, an Irving Hall Democrat, for Police Justice; William P. Mitchell, an Irving Hall Democrat, for Excise Commissioner; John D. Lawson, a Republican, for President of the Department of Taxes and Assessments; Salem H. Wales, a Republican, for Park Commissioner; William Leinteer, a Republican, for Dock Commissioner; Solon B. Smith and Hugh Gardner for Police Justices, and Morris Friedsam for Excise Commissioner.

There was intense excitement during the session. At its close the new officers were sworn in by Mayor Cooper, and in the evening he was honored by a serenade at his residence.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Rev. T. Pelham Dale, in Holloway Jail.

The bitterness of language with which the supporters and opponents of Ritualism contend against each other would be amazing, were it not saddening to reflect how much valuable mental energy is expended on both sides in a manner which all impartial observers cannot but regard as very much worse than utterly useless. The imprisonment of the Rev. T. Pelham Dale has given a fresh impetus to the torrents of fierce denunciation, and equally fierce declamation against "oppression"—the one party being unable to see anything in Mr. Dale but an obstinate and defiant rebel against the law, and the other regarding him in the light of a Christian martyr. Mr. Dale, who is the eldest son of the late Dean Dale, of Rochester, better known as Canon of St. Paul's, was educated at Cambridge, and after holding a curacy at Camberwell for some years, became rector of St. Vedast's, in 1848. At that time the church, like so many others in London city, was almost without a congregation, but since 1873, when the much-complained of changes in the ritual were first adopted, it has been greatly crowded. Mr. Dale, as is well known, has persistently disregarded the judgments, monitions, and inhibitions which have been issued against him, and he has now declared his full intention to end his days in prison rather than yield obedience to a State-made judge. His lodgings in Holloway Jail, as will be seen from our engraving, are small, but by no means uncomfortable, nor are the regulations very severe. He has to rise at six, go to bed at nine; his diet is in no way restricted, and he spends the day as he thinks proper—his wife, son and daughters being allowed to visit him daily, while occasionally other friends are also admitted.

Expulsion of M. Baudry d'Asson from the French Chamber.

At the opening of the Chamber of Deputies M. Baudry d'Asson was temporarily excluded from his seat for unparliamentary language previously spoken. According to the order, he was not to re-enter the Chamber under fourteen days, but on November 11th, he took his seat as if there was no prohibition upon him. Every one expected that a very grave scene was about to be enacted. He maintained an attitude of determination, and kept his seat with his arms crossed. Refusing to obey M. Gambetta's order, the sitting was suspended, the members of the Majority leaving and those of the Right remaining. Continuing obstinate, the Bureau of the Chamber ordered his expulsion, and the guard being called in, he was carried from the Chamber by five soldiers, and confined in an adjoining room.

A Convention of French Barbers.

The Hair dressers' Corporation held a meeting and had a competition for prizes recently at the Summer Circus on the Champs Elysées, at which seventy hair-dressers contended for the gold and silver medals awarded by the corporation. Each hair-dresser brought his model—that is to say, the young woman the manipulation of whose abundant tresses was to display his skill. Very few of the seventy models had dark hair, as fair locks are supposed to bring out better the delicate details of the coiffure, while red hair is even more advantageous. The work was skillfully and swiftly done, to the great satisfaction of fully 3,000 spectators. The first prize for Paris was carried off by M. Auguste Olivier, but it was a Belgian, M. Fontaine, who gained the award for the best historical coiffure.

The Land League Agitation in Ireland.

Lough Mask Farm, which is likely to become a famous place in the history of Ireland, is situated in the County of Mayo, almost in the centre of the district known as the "nursery of the Land League," the first meeting of that organization having been held at Ballia, a village near Castlebar. Captain Boycott, besides managing his own farm, has been for some years agent to Lord Erne, who, it is said, bears an excellent reputation as a landlord. The attempt to serve a number of ejectments in September last led the tenants to appeal to Lord Erne to dismiss him. His lordship refused, and from that day Captain Boycott became a marked man. No laborer dared to work for him, no tradesman to serve him with goods. He was isolated by order of the Land Leaguers, and was compelled to accept the services of constabulary to protect the lives of himself and family. His case is a typical one, and for some time attracted little attention, although he and his wife and daughters were left to get in the crops as best they could. Mr. Manning's letter to the Daily Express, under the signature of "Combination," first started the idea of going to Captain Boycott's assistance. He was soon flooded with correspondence offering every kind of co-operation, and one person alone promised to get together 50,000 volunteers. Mr. Forster, however, at once vetoed the project of an armed invasion, at the same time offering to afford military protection to whatever number of men were required for the bona fide purpose of saving the crops. It was accordingly decided to pick out some fifty or sixty from the great number of Cavan and Monaghan men who were anxious to go, and these, under the leadership of Mr. Manning and Captain Somerset Maxwell, were forwarded. They were escorted by double files of troops from Claremorris to Ballinrobe. While the volunteer farm-hands were at work, Captain Boycott's house was fully guarded by the constabulary and the militia.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE State Senate Chamber at Albany is to be lighted by electricity.

—MARSHFIELD, Me., has been half destroyed, for the second time in a year, by a cyclone.

—TWENTY or thirty people have been killed in Mexico by the remnant of Victoria's band.

—THE census from all the counties in Georgia, excepting three, shows the increase of population since 1870 to be 121,567.

—THE Municipality of Paris has rejected the petition of Henri Rochefort for a site for a monument to deceased Communists.

—A COMPANY has been formed at Bordeaux, France, for the operation of a steamship line between that port and New York.

—THE Democrats of the United States Senate have decided to drop several of the special investigating committees appointed at a previous session.

—THE initial steps have been taken for the erection in Philadelphia of one of the finest Conservatories of Music in the Union. It will be located on Chestnut Street.

—SEVERAL thousand pilgrims returning from Mecca are detained at Bagdad, owing to the Kurds having attacked the last three caravans and killed and wounded over 500 pilgrims.

—IT is reported semi-officially that an attempt will be made by the European Powers to prevent a war between Greece and Turkey. The feeling of mutual hostility between Turkey and Persia is said to be spreading.

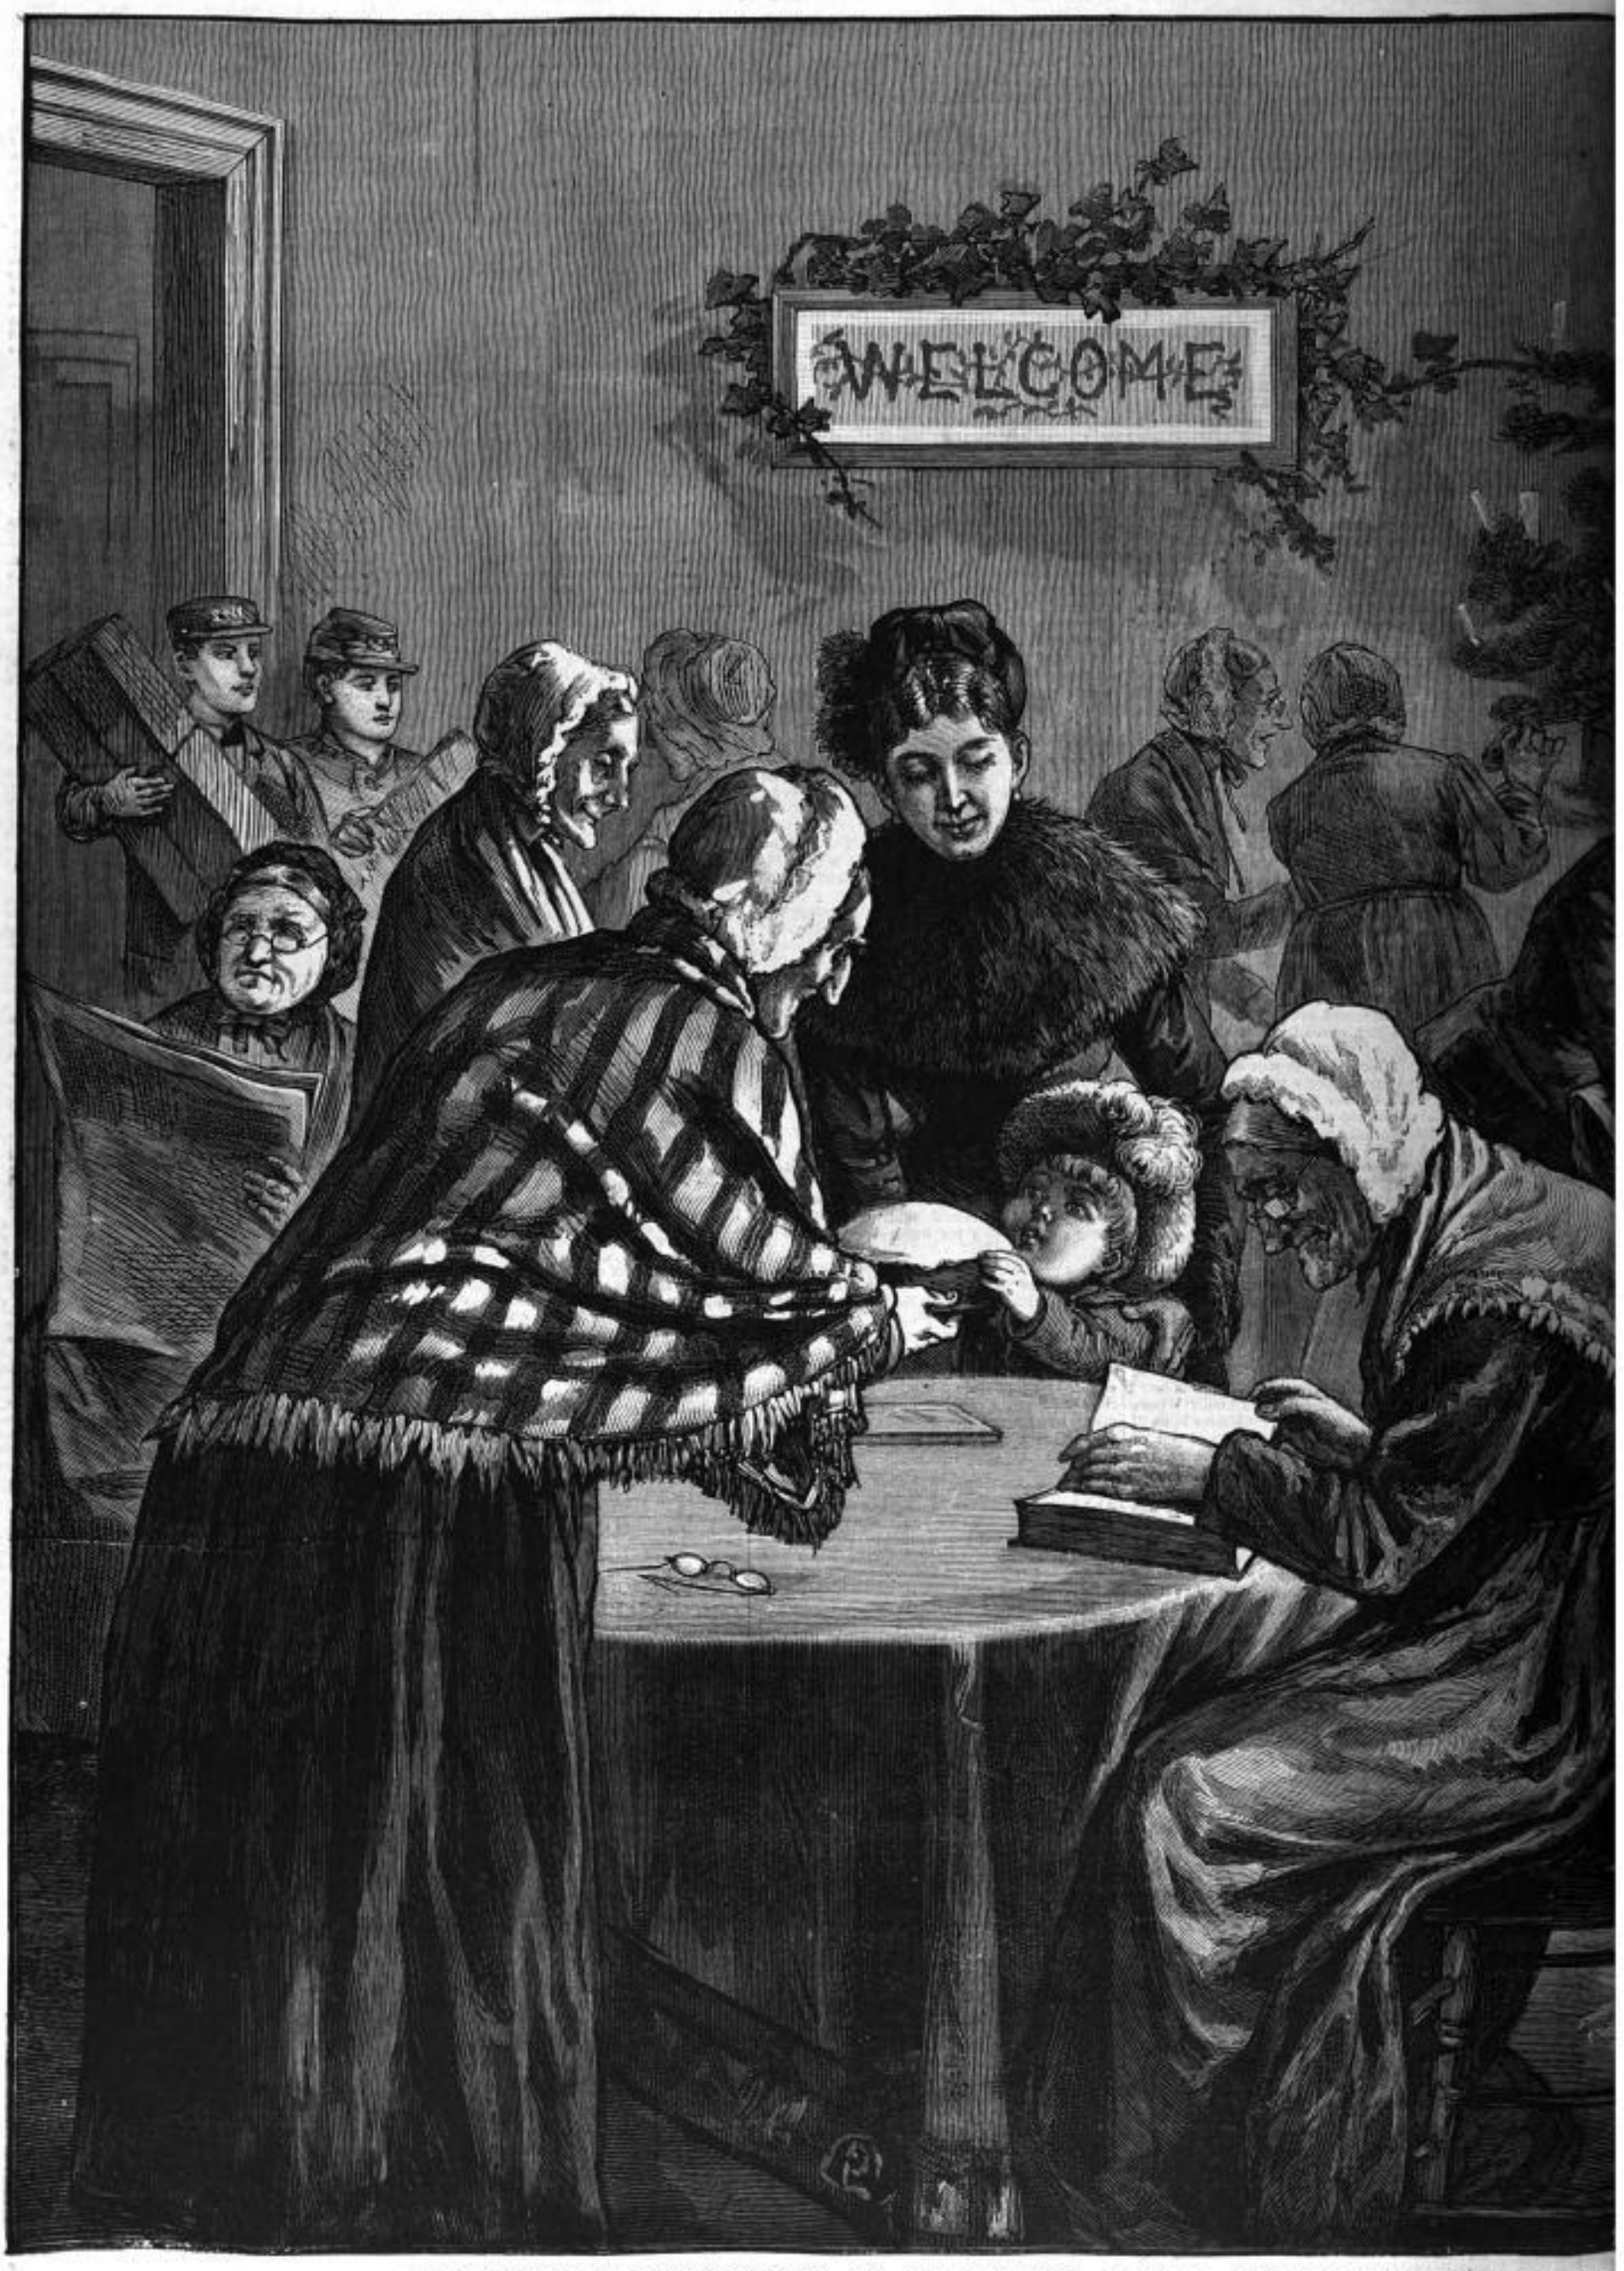
—THERE is some excitement in Spain over the passage in President Hayes's Message referring to the aggressions of cruisers on American vessels in Cuban waters. The press of Madrid are making bitter comments upon it.

—ON the vote for Representatives in Congress, the Republicans of California have 612 majority over the Democrats. The highest candidate for Elector on the Democratic ticket has 94 majority over the highest on the Republican ticket.

—CONTRACTS are already let for the extension of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad from Denison, via Fort Worth, Austin and San Antonio, to Laredo on the Mexican frontier, in all about 400 miles, to be completed during the ensuing year.

—A CORRESPONDENT at Constantinople reports that the relations of the Porte with Persia are very strained, and feelings of mutual hostility are rapidly spreading to the public on account of the Sultan's taking no steps to arrest the Kurdish rebellion.

—COMMISSIONER LE DUC estimates the total value of the breadstuffs, animals and animal matter produced in 1880, at $2,000,000,000; the agricultural exports, at $166,403,426; breadstuffs, $268,050,201, and cotton, $221,017,325. Total exports of all kinds, $823,966,355.



—THE house of refuge on the top of Mount St. Gothard, founded in the fourteenth century, will be permanently closed two years hence. The opening of the tunnel will render it useless, as not even beggars will then cross the mountain on foot. At present the hospice affords shelter, food and a bed to 20,000 people yearly, and is supported by public and private charity. The ride through the tunnel will cost only twenty cents.

—IN an address in this city the other day, Governor St. John of Kansas said that the present prohibitory liquor constitutional amendment first passed the Senate unanimously, and was sent to the House, where it was expected it would be submitted to the people. The anti-temperance element fought it hard, but when it was forced to a vote it lacked only one of the necessary two-thirds vote. Several votes were taken with the same result, and everything indicated that it would be lost. In the midst of the excitement a woman entered the House and appealed to her husband, a Democratic member, in the name of God to change his vote, and he changed it.

—AN English patent has just been granted on the double-web perfecting press, invented by Joseph L. Firm, superintendent of the press-rooms of this establishment. While an ordinary perfecting press, using four plates for each side, will throw off from 10,000 to 15,000 copies per hour, the Firm press, with the same number of plates, will supply 20,000 copies, printed on both sides. In working off newspapers, this press also effects a saving of at least 50 per cent. in stereotyping, as it requires only two forms and four impression cylinders. In some of the large daily newspaper offices, from thirty-two to sixty-four plates are required to work off the edition, but on the Firm double web press used, sixteen plates would be found sufficient to perform double the work of the ordinary press.

—PROFESSOR HIND, who was an official of the Halifax Fishery Commission, and some months ago made charges that the statistics used in the British case were false, has had printed in pamphlet form a letter addressed to the Governor-General of Canada, in which he makes charges of a broader character. He says that not only were the statistics presented to the Commission false, but that the official blue-books of Canada bearing on the fish trade with the United States were systematically falsified for a series of years to produce results that would serve the purpose in view. Exports of the United States were made to appear much less than they really were, for the purpose of making out that the Provinces benefited little by the free admission of fish into the States. Fictitious items of exports to foreign countries were introduced to make it appear that the Provinces were less dependent than they really were on the American market. Other fictitious items were inserted to make it appear that the Americans found a large market for fish in the Provinces. It is alleged that these falsifications began soon after the Treaty of Washington was made.

IN SNOW-TIME.

HOW should I choose to walk the world with thee,
Mine own beloved? When green grass is stirred
By Summer breezes, and each leafy tree
Shelters the nest of many a singing bird?
In time of roses, when the earth doth lie
Dressed in a garment of midsummer hues,
Beneath a canopy of sapphire sky,
Lulled by a soft wind's song? Or should I choose
To walk with thee along a wintry road,
Through flowerless fields, thick-sown with frosty rime,
Beside an ice-bound stream, whose waters flowed
In voiceless music all the Summer-time?
In Winter dreariness, or Summer glee,
How should I choose to walk the world with thee?

The time of roses is the time of love.
Ah, my dear heart! but Winter fires are bright,
And in the lack of sunshine from above
We tend more carefully Love's sacred light.
The path among the roses lieth soft
Sun-kissed and radiant under youthful feet;
But on a wintry way true hands more oft
Do meet and cling in pressure close and sweet.
There is more need of Love's supporting arm
Along Life's slippery pathway in its frost,
There is more need for Love to wrap us warm,
Against Life's cold, when Summer flowers are lost.
Let others share thy life's glad Summer glow,
But let me walk beside thee in its snow!

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER II.—THE QUESTION OF MARRIAGE.

AS Stella answered Lady Loring, she was smartly tapped on the shoulder by an eager guest with a fan.

The guest was a very little woman, with twinkling eyes and a perpetual smile. Nature, corrected by powder and paint, was liberally displayed in her arms, her bosom, and the upper part of her back. Such clothes as she wore, defective perhaps in quantity, were in quality absolutely perfect. More adorable color, shape and workmanship never appeared, even in a milliner's picture book. Her light hair was dressed with a fringe and ringlets, on the pattern which the portraits of the time of Charles the Second have made familiar to us. There was nothing exactly young or exactly old about her, except her voice, which betrayed a faint hoarseness, attributable possibly to exhaustion, produced by untold years of incessant talking. It might be added that she was as active as a squirrel, and as playful as a kitten. But the lady must be treated with a certain forbearance of tone, for this good reason—she was Stella's mother.

Stella turned quickly at the tap of the fan. "Mamma!" she exclaimed, "how you startle me!"

"My dear child," said Mrs. Eyrecourt, "you are constitutionally indolent, and you want startling. Go into the next room directly; Mr. Romayne is looking for you."

Stella drew back a step and eyed her mother in blank surprise. "Is it possible that you know him?" she asked.

"Mr. Romayne doesn't go into society, or we should have met long since," Mrs. Eyrecourt replied. "He is a striking person—and I noticed him when he shook hands with you. That was quite enough for me. I have just introduced myself to him as your mother. He was a little stately and stiff, but most charming when he knew who I was. I volunteered to find you. He was quite astonished. I think he took me for your elder sister. Not the least like each other—are we, Lady Loring? She takes after her poor, dear father. He was constitutionally indolent. My sweet child, rouse yourself. You have drawn a prize in the great lottery at last. If ever a man was in love, Mr. Romayne is that man. I am a physiognomist, Lady Loring, and I see the passions in the face. Oh, Stella, what a property. Vange Abbey. I once drove that way when I was visiting in the neighborhood. Superb. And another fortune (eight thousand a year and a villa at Highgate) since the death of his aunt. And my daughter may be mistress of this, if she only plays her cards properly. What a compensation, after all that we suffered through that monster, Winterfield!"

"Mamma! Pray don't——"

"Stella I will not be interrupted when I am speaking to you for your own good. I don't know a more provoking person, Lady Loring, than my daughter—on certain occasions. And yet I love her. I would go through fire and water for my beautiful child. Only last week I was at a wedding, and I thought of Stella. The church crammed to the doors. A hundred at the wedding-breakfast. The bride's face—there! no language can describe it. Ten bridesmaids in blue and silver. Reminded me of the ten virgins. Only the proportion of foolish ones, this time, was certainly more than five. However, they looked well. The archbishop proposed the health of the bride and bridegroom. So sweetly pathetic. Some of us cried. I thought of my daughter. Oh, if I could live to see Stella the central attraction, so to speak, of such a wedding as that! Only I would have twelve bridesmaids at least, and beat the blue and silver with green and gold. Trying to the complexion, you will say. But there are artificial improvements. At least I am told so. What a house this would be—a broad hint, isn't it, dear Lady Loring?—what a house for a wedding, with the drawing-room to assemble in, and the picture-gallery for the breakfast. I know the archbishop. My darling, he shall marry you. Why don't you go into the next room? Ah, that constitutional indolence. If you only had my energy, as I used to say to your poor father. Will you go? Yes, dear Lady Loring, I should like a glass of champagne and another of those delicious chicken sandwiches. If you don't go, Stella, I shall forget every consideration of propriety, and, big as you are, I shall push you out."

Stella yielded to necessity.

"Keep her quiet, if you can," she whispered to Lady Loring, in the moment of silence that followed. Even Mrs. Eyrecourt was not able to talk while she was drinking champagne.

In the next room Stella found Romayne. He looked careworn and irritable, but brightened directly when she approached him.

"My mother has been speaking to you," she said. "I am afraid——"

He stopped her there.

"She is your mother," he interposed, kindly. "Don't think that I am ungrateful enough to forget that."

She took his arm, and looked at him with all her heart in her eyes.

"Come into a quieter room," she whispered.

Romayne led her away. Neither of them noticed Penrose as they left the room.

He had not moved since Stella had spoken to him. There he remained in his corner, absorbed in thought—and not in happy thought, as his face would have plainly betrayed to any one who had cared to look at him. His eyes sadly followed the retiring figures of Stella and Romayne. The color rose on his haggard face. Like most men who are accustomed to live alone, he had the habit, when he was strongly excited, of speaking to himself. "No," he said, as the acknowledged lovers disappeared through the door, "it is an insult to ask me to do it!" He turned the other way, escaped Lady Loring's notice in the reception-room, and left the house.

Romayne and Stella passed through the card-room and the chess-room, turned into a corridor, and entered the conservatory.

For the first time the place was a solitude. The air of a newly-invented dance, faintly audible through the open windows of the ball-room above, had proved an irresistible temptation. Those who knew the dance were eager to exhibit themselves. Those who had only heard of it were equally anxious to look on and learn. Even towards the latter end of the nineteenth century, the youths and maidens of Society can still be in earnest—when the object in view is a new dance.

What would Major Hynd have said if he had seen Romayne turn into one of the recesses of the conservatory, in which there was a seat which just held two? But the major had forgotten his years and his family; and he, too, was one of the spectators in the ball-room.

"I wonder," said Stella, "whether you know how I feel those kind words of yours, when you spoke of my mother. Shall I tell you?"

She put her arm round his neck and kissed him. He was a man new to love, in the nobler sense of the word. The exquisite softness in the touch of her lips, the delicious fragrance of her breath, intoxicated him. Again and again he returned the kiss. She drew back; she recovered her self-possession with a suddenness and a certainty incomprehensible to a man. From the depths of tenderness she passed to the shallows of frivolity. In her own defense she was almost as superficial as her mother, in less than a moment.

"What would Mr. Penrose say if he saw you!" she whispered.

"Why do you speak of Penrose? Have you seen him to-night?"

"Yes—looking sadly out of his element, poor man. I did my best to set him at his ease—because I know you like him."

"Dear Stella!"

"No, not again! I am speaking seriously, now. Mr. Penrose looked at me with a strange kind of interest—I can't describe it. Have you taken him into our confidence?"

"He is so devoted—he has such a true interest in me," said Romayne—"I really felt ashamed to treat him like a stranger. On our journey to London, I did own that it was your charming letter which had decided me on returning. I did say, 'I must tell her myself how well she has understood me, and how deeply I feel her kindness.' Penrose took my hand in his gentle, considerate way. 'I understand you, too,' he said, and that was all that passed between us."

"Nothing more, since that time?"

"Nothing."

"Not a word of what we said to each other, when we were alone last week in the picture-gallery?"

"Not a word. I am self-tormentor enough to distrust myself, even now. God knows, I have concealed nothing from you, and yet—— Am I not selfishly thinking of my own happiness, Stella, when I ought to be thinking only of you? You know, my angel, with what a life you must associate yourself if you marry me. Are you really sure that you have love enough and courage enough to be my wife?"

She rested her head caressingly on his shoulder, and looked up at him with her charming smile.

"How many times must I say it," she asked, "before you will believe me? Once more—I have love enough and courage enough to be your wife; and I knew it, Lewis, the first time I saw you! Will that confession satisfy your scruples? And will you promise never again to doubt yourself or me?"

Romayne promised and sealed the promise—unresisted this time—with a kiss. "When are we to be married?" he whispered.

She lifted her head from his shoulder with a sigh. "If I am to answer you honestly," she replied, "I must speak of my mother before I speak of myself."

Romayne submitted to the duties of his new position as well as he understood them.

"Do you mean that you have told your mother of our engagement?" he said. "In that case, is it my duty or yours—I am very ignorant in these matters—to consult her wishes? My own idea is, that I ought to ask her if she approves of me as her son-in-law, and that you might then speak to her of the marriage."

Stella thought of Romayne's tastes, all in favor of modest retirement, and of her mother's tastes, all in favor of ostentation and display. She frankly owned the result produced in her own mind.

"I am afraid to consult my mother about our marriage," she said.

Romayne looked astonished. "Do you think Mrs. Eyrecourt will disapprove of it?" he asked.

Stella was equally astonished on her side. "Disapprove of it?" she repeated. "I know for certain that my mother will be delighted."

"Then where is the difficulty?"

There was but one way of definitely answering that question. Stella boldly described her mother's idea of a wedding—including the archbishop, the twelve bridesmaids in green and gold, and the hundred guests at breakfast in Lord Loring's picture gallery. Romayne's consternation literally deprived him, for the moment, of the power of speech. To say that he looked at Stella as a prisoner in "the condemned cell" might have looked at the sheriff, announcing the morning of his execution, would be to do injustice to the prisoner. He receives his shock without flinching; and, in proof of his composure, celebrates his wedding with the gallows by a breakfast which he will not live to digest.

"If you think as your mother does," Romayne began, as soon as he had recovered his self possession, "no opinion of mine shall stand in the way——" He could get no further. His vivid imagination saw the archbishop and the bridesmaids, heard the hundred guests and their dreadful speeches; his voice faltered, in spite of himself.

Stella eagerly relieved him. "My darling, I don't think as my mother does," she interposed tenderly. "I am sorry to say, we have very few sympathies in common. Marriages, as I think, ought to be celebrated as privately as possible—the near and dear relations present, and no one else. If there must be rejoicings and banquets, and hundreds of invitations, let them come when the wedded pair are at home after the honeymoon, beginning life in earnest. These are odd ideas for a woman to have—but they are my ideas, for all that."

Romayne's face brightened. "How few women possess your fine sense and your delicacy of feeling!" he exclaimed. "Surely your mother must give way when she hears we are both of one mind about our marriage!"

Stella knew her mother too well to share the opinion thus expressed. Mrs. Eyrecourt's capacity for holding to her own little ideas and for persisting (where her social interests were concerned) in trying to insinuate those ideas into the minds of other persons, was a capacity which no resistance, short of absolute brutality, could overcome. She was perfectly capable of worrying Romayne (as well as her daughter) to the utmost limits of human endurance, in the firm conviction that she was bound to convert all heretics of their way of thinking to the orthodox way in the matter of weddings. Putting this view of the case with all possible delicacy, in speaking of her mother, Stella expressed herself plainly enough, nevertheless, to enlighten Romayne.

He made another suggestion.

"Can we marry privately," he said, "and tell Mrs. Eyrecourt of it afterwards?"

This essentially masculine solution of the difficulty was at once rejected. Stella was too good a daughter to suffer her mother to be treated with even the appearance of disrespect.

"Oh," she said, "think how mortified and distressed my mother would be! She must be present at my marriage."

An idea of a compromise occurred to Romayne.

"What do you say," he proposed, "to arranging for the marriage privately, and then telling Mrs. Eyrecourt only a day or two beforehand, when it would be too late to send out invitations? If your mother would be disappointed——"

"She would be angry," Stella interposed.

"Very well, lay all the blame on me. Besides, there might be two other persons present, whom I am sure Mrs. Eyrecourt is always glad to meet. You don't object to Lord and Lady Loring?"

"Object? I wouldn't be without them at my wedding for the whole world."

"Any one else, Stella?"

"Any one, Lewis, whom you like."

"Then I say, no one else. My own love! When may it be? My lawyers can get the settlements ready in a fortnight, or less. Will you say in a fortnight?"

His arm was round her waist; his lips were touching her lovely neck. She was not a woman to take refuge in the commonplace coquetries of the sex.

"Yes," she said, softly, "if you wish it." She rose and withdrew herself from him. "For my sake, we must not be here together any longer, Lewis." As she spoke, the music in the ballroom ceased. Stella ran out of the conservatory.

The first person she encountered, on returning to the reception-room, was Father Benwell.

CHAPTER III.—THE END OF THE BALL.

THE priest's long journey did not appear to have fatigued him. He was as cheerful and as polite as ever, and so paternally attentive to Stella that it was quite impossible for her to pass him with a formal bow.

"I have come all the way from Devonshire," he said. "The train has been behind time, as usual, and I am one of the late arrivals in consequence. I miss some familiar faces at this delightful party. Mr. Romayne, for instance. Perhaps he is not one of the guests?"

"Oh, yes."

"Has he gone away?"

"Not that I know of."

The tone of her replies warned Father Benwell well to let Romayne be. He tried another name.

"And Arthur Penrose?" he inquired next.

"I think Mr. Penrose has left us."

As she answered she looked towards Lady Loring. The hostess was the centre of a circle of ladies and gentlemen. Before she was at liberty, Father Benwell might take his departure. Stella resolved to make the attempt for herself which she had asked Lady Loring to make for her. It was better to try and be defeated than not to try at all.

"I asked Mr. Penrose what part of Devonshire you were visiting," she resumed, assuming her more gracious manner. "I know something myself of the north coast, especially the neighborhood of Clovelly."

Not the faintest change passed over the priest's face; his fatherly smile had never been in a better state of preservation.

"Isn't it a charming place?" he said, with enthusiasm. "Clovelly is the most remarkable and most beautiful village in England. I have so enjoyed my little holiday—excursions by sea and excursions by land—do you know I feel quite young again?"

He lifted his eyebrows playfully and rubbed his plump hands one over the other with such an intolerably innocent air of enjoyment that Stella positively hated him. She felt her capacity for self-restraint failing her. Under the influence of strong emotion, her thoughts lost their customary discipline. In attempting to fathom Father Benwell, she was conscious of having undertaken a task which required more pliable moral qualities than she possessed. To her own unutterable annoyance she was at a loss what to say next. At that critical moment her mother appeared—eager for news of the conquest of Romayne.

"My dear child, how pale you look!" said Mrs. Eyrecourt. "Come with me, directly; you must have a glass of wine."

This dexterous device for entrapping Stella into a private conversation failed.

"Not now, mamma, thank you," she said.

Father Benwell, on the point of discreetly withdrawing, stopped, and looked at Mrs. Eyrecourt with an appearance of respectful interest. "Your mother?" he said to Stella, "I should feel honored if you will introduce me."

Having (not very willingly) performed the ceremony of presentation, Stella drew back a little. She had no desire to take any part in the conversation that might follow—but she had her own reasons for waiting near enough to hear it.

In the meanwhile, Mrs. Eyrecourt turned on her inexhaustible flow of small talk, with her customary facility. No distinction of persons troubled her; no convictions of any sort stood in her way. She was equally ready (provided she met him in good society) to make herself agreeable to a Puritan or a Papist.

"Delighted to make your acquaintance, Father Benwell. Surely, I met you at that delightful evening at the duke's? I mean when we welcomed the cardinal back from Rome. Dear old man—if one may speak so familiarly of a prince of the Church—how charmingly he bears his new honors. Such patriarchal simplicity, as every one remarked. Have you seen him lately?"

The idea of the Order to which he belonged feeling any special interest in a cardinal (except when they made him of some use to them), privately amused Father Benwell. "How wise the Church was," he thought, "in inventing a spiritual aristocracy. Even this fool of a woman is impressed by it." His spoken reply was true to his assumed character as one of the inferior clergy. "Poor priests, like me, madam, see but little of princes of the Church in the houses of dukes." Saying this with the most becoming humility, he turned the talk in a more productive direction, before Mrs. Eyrecourt could proceed with her recollections of "the evening at the duke's."

"Your charming daughter and I have been talking about Clovelly," he continued. "I have just been spending a little holiday in that delightful place. It was a surprise to me, Mrs. Eyrecourt, to see so many really beautiful country seats in the neighborhood. I was particularly struck—you know it, of course?—by Beaupark House."

Mrs. Eyrecourt's little twinkling eyes suddenly became still and steady. It was only for a moment. But even that trifling change boded ill for the purpose which the priest had in view.

Having the opportunity of turning Stella's mother into a valuable source of information actually placed in his hands, Father Benwell reasoned with himself, as he had reasoned at Miss Notman's ten-table. A frivolous person was a person easily persuaded to gossip, and not likely to be reticent in keeping secrets. In drawing this conclusion, the reverend Father was justified by every wise man's experience of human nature, but he forgot to make allowance for the modifying influence of circumstances. Even the wits of a fool can be quickened by contact with the world. For many years Mrs. Eyrecourt had held her place in Society, acting under an intensely selfish sense of her own interests, fortified by those cunning instincts which grow best in a barren intellect. Perfectly unworthy of being trusted with secrets which only concerned other people, this frivolous creature could be the unassailable guardian of secrets which concerned herself. The instant the priest referred indirectly to Winterfield, by speaking of Beaupark House, her instincts warned her, as if in words: "Be careful for Stella's sake!"

"Oh, yes!" said Mrs. Eyrecourt. "I know Beaupark House; but——May I make a confession?" she added, with her sweetest smile.

Father Benwell caught her tone with his customary tact. "A confession at a ball is a novelty, even in my experience," he answered, with his sweetest smile.

"How good of you to encourage me!" proceeded Mrs. Eyrecourt. "No, thank you; I don't want to sit down. My confession won't take long, and I really must give that poor pale daughter of mine a glass of wine. A student of human nature like you—they say all priests are students of human nature—accustomed, of course, to be consulted in difficulties, and to hear real confessions, must know that we poor women are sadly subject to whims and caprices. We can't resist them as men do; and the dear, good men generally make allowances for us. Well, do you know, that place of Mr. Winterfield's is one of my caprices. Oh, dear, I speak carelessly; I ought to have said, the place represents one of my caprices. In short, Father Benwell, Beaupark House is perfectly odious to me, and I think Clovelly the most over-rated place in the world. I haven't the least reason to give, but so it is. Excessively foolish of me. It's like hysterics. I can't help it. I'm sure you will forgive me. There isn't a place on the habitable globe that I am not ready to feel interested in, except detestable Devonshire. I am so sorry you went there. The next time you have a holiday, take my advice. Try the Continent."

"I should like it of all things," said Father Benwell, "only I don't speak French. Allow me to get Miss Eyrecourt a glass of wine."

He spoke with the most perfect temper and tranquillity. Having paid his little attention to Stella, and having relieved her of the empty glass, he took his leave, with a parting request thoroughly characteristic of the man.

"Are you staying in town, Mrs. Eyrecourt?" he asked.

"Oh, of course, at the height of the season!"

"May I have the honor of calling on you, and talking a little more about the Continent?"

If he had said it in so many words, he could scarcely have informed Mrs. Eyrecourt more plainly that he thoroughly understood her, and that he meant to try again. Strong in the worldly training of half a lifetime, she at once informed him of her address, with the complimentary phrases proper to the occasion. "Five o'clock tea on Wednesdays, Father Benwell. Don't forget!"

The moment he was gone, she drew her daughter into a quiet corner.

"Don't be frightened, Stella. That sly old person has some interest in trying to find out about Winterfield. Do you know why?"

"Indeed I don't, mamma. I hate him!"

"Oh, hush, hush! Hate him as much as you like, but always be civil to him. Tell me, have you been in the conservatory with Romayne?"

"Yes."

"All going on well?"

"Yes."

"My sweet child! Dear, dear me, the wine has done you no good; you're as pale as ever. Is it that priest? Oh, pooh, pooh! Leave Father Benwell to me."

A NINETEENTH CENTURY CHRISTMAS.

CHRISTMAS! Word fraught with joy, with festivity, with home, with all that serves to lend a brighter hue to life! Christmas! Word laden with despairing sadness to those for whom life has proved but Dead Sea fruit! What can be a more pitiable object than decrepitude sinking under the accumulated load of years and of penury? Arrived at that period when the most fortunate confess they have no pleasure, how forlorn is her situation who, destitute of the means of subsistence, has survived her last child, or her last friend. Solitary and neglected, without comfort and without hope, depending for everything on a kindness she has no means of conciliating, she finds herself left alone in the world to which she has ceased to belong, and is only felt in society as a burden it is impatient to shake off. And yet there is a bright side to this gloomy picture—a very bright and happy side, for, as it will be seen in our illustration, the dear old ladies are being cared for, and every comfort that ingenuity can suggest provided for them so as to render Christmas, if not a day of absolute rejoicing, at least a day for calm contemplation in surroundings cheering, consoling and protecting.

NEW LIGHTHOUSE FOR THE MISSISSIPPI JETTIES.

THE new first order lighthouse to be erected at the South Pass (Jetties) of the Mississippi River, is of iron, and was built some years ago for erection at Trinity Shoal, La., in deep water, and about twenty-five miles from the nearest land on the coast. While the working force was operating on the Shoal from a large wooden platform, supported on wooden piles driven into the sand, a hurricane swept over the locality, destroying the platform and causing a loss of a considerable portion of the ironwork of the foundation. Some of this iron was subsequently recovered. After the storm subsided it was ascertained that the action of an angry sea had scoured off the surface of the shoal to a depth varying from five to eight feet. In other words, where there was originally 18 feet depth of water, the storm created a depth of from 20 to 23 feet. As the shoal proved so unstable, the idea of building such a lighthouse on it was abandoned.

As a new lighthouse became necessary at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, and as much of the projected Trinity Shoal structure was on hand, it was deemed an economical measure to utilize the material at the new point.

The foundation is of wood, constructed in the most elaborate and painstaking manner, every conceivable device which will give solidity to the structure being used. On the spot where the tower is to be built the mud will be excavated for several feet, and then between 200 and 250 pine piles will be sunk through the mud into the sand. To these piles will be bolted 12x12 timbers, the cracks between the timbers being filled with bits of wood so as to make the structure solid. On the top of the 12x12 timbers and at right angles with them, a flooring of 12x12 timbers will be laid, securely bolted down by wrought-iron drift-bolts; and on this flooring another of timber of the same thickness will be put, the plank being laid at an angle of 45 degrees with that immediately below. The mud will then be thrown back upon it.

On this foundation are bolted nine disks, to which iron spikes are secured. One of these disks is placed in the centre of the foundation, and the other eight around it, at a distance of 20 feet, thus giving the structure an octagonal plan, the side of which will measure a little less than 15 feet and 11-12 inches.

The iron piles rise 20 feet perpendicularly, and then converge to a common centre in the focal plain. This gives the superstructure the form of the frustum of an octagonal pyramid, measuring vertically 98 feet from the axis of the pile-head ties to a horizontal plane 3½ inches below the upper surface of the watch-room floor, in which plain the axis of the inclined columns, at their extreme upper ends, are distant 4 feet 6 inches from the axis of the tower.

The columns of the first section are of wrought-iron, forged tapering. The columns of the other sections are of hollow cast-iron, decreasing in diameter as they ascend with the successive sections. The columns are secured together by cast-iron sockets, which also form points of attachment for the horizontal ties and the diagonal tension braces.

The columns support the watch-room and lantern. The focal plane of the latter is 12 feet 1 inch above the upper surface of the watch-room floor, the floor being 3½ inches above the top of the pyramid, making the total height of the focal plane a little over 125 feet above the floor of the foundation. This height will enable the light to be seen fully eighteen nautical miles.

The lighthouse-keeper's dwelling, which occupies the second section, is two stories in height, built chiefly of iron, circular in form, and containing in the second story a door for each room opening on to the gallery around the outside.

THE LONG ISLAND HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

THE new building of the Long Island Historical Society, which is to be turned over to the trustees on January 4th, is a handsome and substantial structure, on the corner of Pierrepont and Clinton Streets, Brooklyn. The ground on which the building stands was purchased two years ago for $32,000. It adjoins the site of the Church of the Holy Trinity, which, with its tall spire and Gothic architecture, affords a striking contrast to its square and sturdy neighbor. The contrast is still further enhanced by the materials used in the building—brown stone for the church and Philadelphia brick, with terra cotta trimmings, for the Society building. This structure is three stories high, and has a front of ninety-nine feet in Pierrepont Street, and seventy-five feet in Clinton Street. The height is not far from 100 feet, and a clock tower surmounts the main entrance in Pierrepont Street.

The ornamentation upon the street side is elaborate, and includes native fruits, flowers and cereals, done in terra cotta, molded when wet. On the Pierrepont Street side, between the windows of the second story, are the portrait heads of Columbus and Franklin done in terra cotta, and on the side adjoining Clinton Street the heads of Shakespeare, Beethoven, Gutenberg and Michael Angelo, in high relief, are represented. Beneath them is the legend Historia Testis Temporum.

The front bears the name of the Society, and over the doorway are the words, "Library and Museum." The doorway is flanked by the heads of an Indian and a Norseman. The only stones used in the structure are three polished granite pillars under the porch on each side. Upon entering the building the main hall will be found upon the first floor, with dimensions of 80 feet by 50 feet. The floor rises toward the rear from the platform, which is in the further end. The hall will seat 600 persons, and has four exits. Above this are the library and reading-rooms. There will be shelf-room for 100,000 volumes, and the reading-rooms, for both men and women, will be as comfortable as possible. The Society has now 40,000 books and pamphlets, estimated to be worth $80,000. Most of these have been collected since the incorporation in 1863.

Upon the third floor of the building the museum will be established, and many historical objects of interest will be displayed. In addition to the museum, upon the floor will be a room which can be shut off by sliding-doors for scientific meetings and other discussions which attract only a few persons. The structure throughout is finished in ash, and it will be heated by steam. The entire cost of the building will be nearly $110,000. To meet this a fund has been accumulating for a number of years. It has been expended under the direction of a committee of which Samuel B. Mclean is chairman. The President of the Society is the Rev. Dr. Richard S. Storrs, pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, and the librarian, Mr. George S. Hanna.

OUR NATIONAL INDUSTRIES.

THE VINEYARDS OF SONOMA VALLEY, CALIFORNIA.

GENERAL as has become the use of California wines, not only in this country, but in England, France, China, Japan, Australia and the Sandwich Islands, to which places regular consignments are now shipped, it is believed that the industry of viniculture has not yet passed out of the experimental stage. The gifts of nature are so vast in that section of our country, and the energy of man so tireless, that the possibilities of the future are scarcely comprehended.

The chief grape-growing districts are the Sonoma and the Sacramento Valleys, although the St. Helena District is a heavy contributor to the general vintage. For many years viniculturists clung to what was known as the Mission grape, but of late years nearly all have adopted foreign vines, and from this enterprise the vast growth of the industry really dates. The preference for foreign varieties of grapes is universal among the vineyardists of Sonoma Valley. In addition to Malvoisie, the Zinfandel and the Reisling, the Chasselas, the Gutedel and the White Frontignon are being extensively cultivated there. The White Frontignon has been adopted as a Muscat grape, the Muscat of Alexandria not finding any favor among the Sonoma viniculturists. One grape which is coming into great favor in Sonoma Valley for the manufacture of a sweet wine is the Flame Tokay. Some viniculturists esteem it very highly. It yields what is known as the lower grade of the famous Tokay mountain of Hungary. The grape has to be picked when nearly a raisin, and the juice is a thick syrup. Fine qualities of red wine are now made in Sonoma, especially from the first and second crops of the Zinfandel vine. The Zinfandel is now without doubt proven to be the best claret grape grown in California. During the past few years, under the efforts of a few enterprising merchants, the sale and consumption of California wines in the Atlantic Coast market and cities has greatly increased, and is now one of the most important branches of the business. The single house of A. Werner & Co., 306 Broadway, New York, who were pioneers in popularizing California wines in this market, bottle and pack an average of over 1,200 gallons weekly of Sonoma and Napa white wines, which, as American Extra Dry Champagne, are distributed to all cities and States east of the Rocky Mountains. Shipments have also been made to Europe and South America.

In the Sacramento Valley the vineyards are devoted almost exclusively to the Orleans and Zinfandel wines. The Orleans grape produces the finest white wine, and contains all the characteristics of Rhenish wines. It is a fine bearer, and the fruit is sweet, matures early and ripens uniformly.

The prevailing varieties in the St. Helena District are the Zinfandel, the Black Malvoisie, the Reisling, the Chasselas and the Burgher. Only a very small quantity of Mission grape wine (red and white) was manufactured in the St. Helena District during the past year. The little that was manufactured was either shipped to San Francisco for local consumption or was converted into brandy, port and Angelica.

Each variety of grape is better adapted to the manufacture of a specific wine than any other. Thus, for red and white wine, the Zinfandel stands pre-eminent. For hock wines, the preference is given the Orleans, the Chasselas, the Reisling and the Gutedel. The Mission, the Malvoisie, and the Tenturier are better adapted for the manufacture of port. The Muscat of Frontignon, the Muscat of Alexandria, the Gray Dechay, and possibly the Flame Tokay make better sweet white wine than anything else, and they are better adapted for that description of wine than any other yet experimented with. For the manufacture of brandy, experts give the preference to Folle Blanche and the Burgher, the latter being good to mix with other white wines, as it is neutral in its flavor, but tart. Some of the foreign varieties of vines which are considered practically worthless in Europe have been quite successful here. The Chasselas is a notable instance. In France it is a complete failure, and in Germany it is only a partial success.

The phylloxera has not made its presence felt very perceptibly anywhere outside of the Sonoma Valley. The Napa vineyards claim to be entirely free from it. Its ravages in Sonoma Valley are by no means general. So far it has not touched any of the foreign vines. All its depredations are confined to the Mission variety. It seems to have lodged itself in soil where water remains standing on the surface for a long time. Soil on the uplands not thoroughly drained is thus affected. A patch of fifteen acres of vines in one yard has been completely destroyed by it, and a patch of five acres in another yard has been overrun in the same manner. But the vines outside of these patches show no signs of the presence of the pest. Whether it will attack the foreign varieties with the same vigor as it has the Mission vine is something which time only will prove. Possibly the precautions now being taken by the viniculturists to prevent the pest from spreading, and the remedies applied for its extermination will be crowned with success. The steps thus far taken by the vineyardists seem to have been effectual in confining it to those localities in which it first made its appearance.

Data have already been gathered showing that the yield of wine from the Los Angeles vineyards for this year will amount to 1,800,000 gallons, and of brandy 250,000, with the prospect that over $1,000,000 will be received in the county for this crop alone. At least 1,000,000 vines were planted in this county in the past year, and the prospect is that an equal amount will be planted next. The fact is that the wine industry in Los Angeles County is destined to expand wonderfully. In no part of the world does the grape come to greater perfection than here, and it is a crop that never fails. In exceptional years, like the present, the yield is enormous, and with the prices paid by the wine-makers there is no crop the cultivator can raise which will afford so large a net money return. There is scarcely a spot in the county in which a vineyard cannot be successfully planted, and with careful cultivation the vines will thrive without irrigation.

A STATE FAIR FOR ABUSED CHILDREN.

A STATE fair for abused children, in charge of 6,000 ladies, representing the different cities and towns, in aid of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, was opened in Horticultural Hall, Boston, on Wednesday evening, December 8th. Addresses were made by Gov. Long and Mayor Prince, and after a concert by the Germania Band, the enterprise was declared open.

In the upper hall-tables and booths are ranged along the walls; a flower-table, prettily decorated, is in the centre, and on the platform is a harvest-table, one of the most attractive of all. It is presided over by Mrs. Francis Low, of Chelsea. Miss Maude Howe and other young ladies are in charge of the flower-table, and the other tables are arranged as follows: Boston, Mrs. H. C. Hasbrouck, of Boston; art and stationery, Mrs. J. Amory Codman, of Boston; Plymouth County, Mrs. N. J. B. Lincoln, of Hingham; Norfolk County, Mrs. Winslow Warren, of Dedham; children's table, Mrs. Charles O'Neil, of Charlestown; Dorchester annex, Miss Florence Everett, of Dorchester; Essex County, Mrs. William H. Ladd, of Lynn; Bristol County, ladies of New Bedford; donation table, Mrs. John L. Hill, of Boston; Worcester County, Mrs. John A. Dana, of Worcester; Middlesex County annex, Mrs. John W. Hastings, of Medford; Middlesex County, Mrs. Thomas S. Mandell, of Newton; Hampden, Hampshire, Franklin and Berkshire Counties, Mrs. G. L. Smith, of Boston, and Mrs. Theodore Judah, of Greenfield. Home-made pickles and preserves are sold by Mrs. F. B. Fay and Mrs. Sibyl M. Hunt, of Chelsea; candy by Mrs. Henry G. Fay, the Children's Appeal, a daily paper, by Mrs Edith Aiken. Mrs. Kate P. Ward is president of a "mental pharmacy" table, and Mrs. Charles Blaney, of Dorchester, manages a loan collection.

A café has been opened in the lower hall. It is in charge of Mrs. C. A. Vinton, who has received generous contributions from churches and individuals. There is no charge for admission to this department, and for the accommodation of business men and women, a hot dinner will be served between the hours of 12 and 2.

The fair is to close on the 15th.

THE PROPOSED SITE FOR THE WORLD'S FAIR OF 1883.

ON Wednesday, December 8th, the Executive Committee of the World's Fair unanimously adopted a resolution calling for a detailed report from the Committee on Sites which selected Inwood as the best locality for the purpose. As a scene of natural beauty this site is not surpassed by any other locality around New York City, and its surroundings and the various avenues of approach to it are full of romantic and beautiful places, around many of which are historical and legendary associations of the richest character. It occupies 260 acres of the almost level plain on the banks of the Harlem River, at the extreme northern end of Manhattan Island. There is on the ground only a single hill, which is perhaps an acre in extent and twenty or thirty feet high. All the rest of the site is level or gently sloping ground, ready for building without previous grading. The soil to the edge of the water is sandy, and no complaint has ever been made of malarial or other troubles incident to marshy ground, such as lies to the east of the Harlem. The site is surrounded on every side by heights, on several of which are the earthworks, still in existence, of forts successively held by American and British troops under command of General Washington and Lord Howe.

The property is largely owned by private individuals. It has a frontage of one mile on Broadway or the Kingsbridge Road. The land is nearly level, and from it a fine view of High Bridge and other surrounding points of interest may be had. Near by 400 Hessians slain in the Revolutionary War were buried. The site is 1,400 feet from the Hudson River at the nearest point, and there are already two good docks built on the Harlem. It is fifty-three minutes' ride from the Grand Central Depot by elevated railroad as at present constructed, and only sixteen minutes by the Hudson River Railroad. The water in the Harlem along the front of the property varies in depth from eighteen to forty feet at low tide. The boats from Jersey City will have no difficulty in landing there. The Albany boat companies have already secured land for docks.

Besides the facilities for reaching the place by the railroads, elevated and surface, the horse-cars and steamboats, there are half a dozen drives either complete or near completion by which New Yorkers may go to the fair. The Tenth Avenue is completed to the point of the bluff south of the site, and will be continued around Fort George Avenue to Eleventh Avenue. New Avenue, Eleventh Avenue and Audubon Avenue, which are already laid out, will be completed, and from the point of intersection shown on the map to the fair grounds a boulevard will be made. Broadway is now a boulevard all the way to the ground, and the ridge road, leading through some of the finest private parks in America, affords as pleasant a drive to-day as can be found anywhere.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. GARRETT has been re-elected President of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

CAPT. H. W. HOWGATE, of the Signal Service Office, has tendered his resignation unconditionally.

THE Rev. Leigh R. Brewer was consecrated Bishop of Montana, at Watertown, N. Y., on December 8th.

THE Empress of Austria has taken Ormond Castle, Kilkenny, for six weeks' hunting with the Kilkenny hounds.

THE friends of Senator Lamar apprehend that his health will not permit his attendance in the Senate again. He is said to be very feeble.

THE trustees of the Central Independent Church of Chicago, of which Professor David O. Swing is pastor have raised his salary from $7,000 to $10,000.

MR. FRANK BUCKLAND, the English naturalist and pisciculturist, is suffering from a severe attack of dropsy and now lies in a very critical condition.

THE Emperor William of Germany has been, during the past year, earning the gratitude of the archæologists. He has defrayed from his own private purse the expenses of the excavations at Olympia.

GENERAL WILLIAM B. HAZEN has been appointed Chief Signal Officer of the army. This appointment promotes General McCook, of General Sherman's staff, to the colonelcy of the Sixth Infantry.

EX-QUEEN ISABELLA has ordered her bankers to invest largely in Panama Canal shares. Prince Hohenlohe, German Ambassador to France, has congratulated M. de Lesseps on the financial success of the enterprise.

PROFESSOR NORDENSKJÖLD has just been elected a member of the Swedish Legislature. He was supported by a so-called party of the Bourse, while his opponent, a manufacturer, was the candidate of the Laborers' Party.

SIR RICHARD WALLACE, who had a coupon calling for $220,000 annually, used to be the largest creditor of France, but now M. Furtado draws a million francs a quarter, which represents an investment of $16,000,000 in the funds.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL EDWARD O. C. ORD, being over 62 years of age, has, by direction of the President, been retired from active service and ordered to repair to his home in Washington. Colonel N. A. Miles has been made a brigadier-general.

THE Czarowitz, the heir to the Russian throne, is intensely popular with all classes in his country. He is prodigiously Russian in feeling, has shown a decided will and strong character in all the public duties that have been committed to him, and is an excellent husband and father.

THE marriage of Prince William of Prussia, eldest son of the Crown Prince, with Princess Augusta Victoria of Augustenburg, seems to be definitely fixed for the 25th of February. The royal pair, it also appears, will reside at Potsdam in Summer, in the Marble Palace, and Winter in the Schloss.

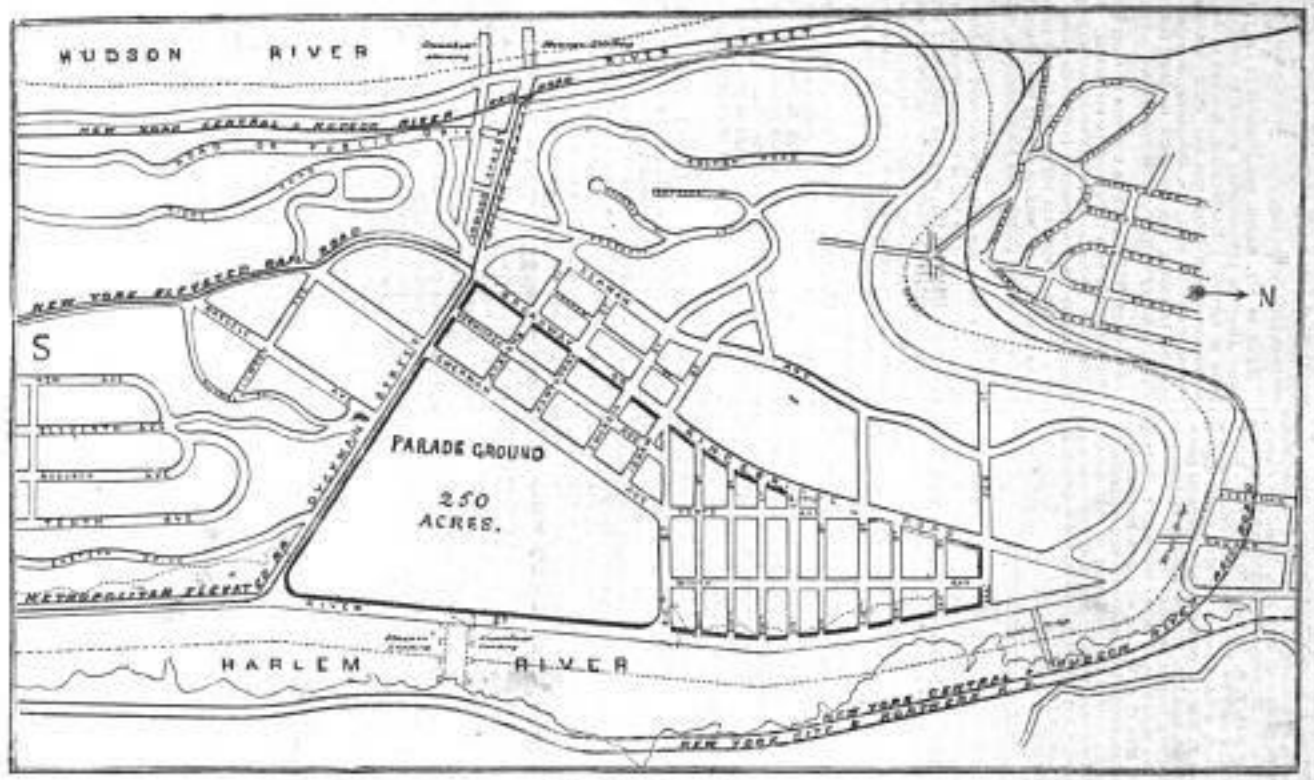
MR. GLADSTONE'S withdrawal from the House of Commons is demanded by his physician, who says that the Premier's health cannot stand such an arduous Parliamentary session as the forthcoming one promises to be. It is currently reported that after the Budget is made known Mr. Gladstone will accept a peerage and retire to the Upper House.

GENERAL SIR FREDERICK ROBERTS has been so successful as a man of war that he is to be made a lieutenant-general in spite of the fact that he will have to pass over the heads of one hundred and eighty officers who stand senior to him on the list of major-generals. The freedom of the City of London and a sword of honor are to be presented to him.

NEXT to Mr. Marsh, our Minister to Italy, the oldest American representative abroad by consecutive years of service is Mr. Bingham, Minister to Japan, whose appointment dates from May, 1873. Mr. Marsh was appointed in 1861; Mr. Delaplaine, Secretary of Legation in Vienna, was appointed in 1869; and Mr. Wurts, Secretary in Rome, in the same year.

ANOTHER Bill relative to the case of Gen. Fitz-John Porter has been introduced in the Senate. The Bill, a substitute for the one which occasioned so long a debate, authorizes the President to reinstate Porter in the Army with a rank not higher than that of colonel on the retired list, and without any pay or allowance for the time which has passed since his dismissal by court-martial.

SOME time since the now deposed Bishop of Tournai asserted that he had in his possession an autograph letter from Pius IX., in which that Pontiff wrote that the election of Cardinal Pecci as his successor would be the ruin of the Church. A confidential agent who was sent to Belgium has seen the letter and brings back an assurance of its authenticity, which is now admitted at the Vatican.



JOSEPH B. HOYT, of Stamford, Conn., has promised to give $2,500 to Richmond (Va.) College, and $2,500 to Richmond Colored Institute. John H. Deane, of New York City, who was a private in the Federal army, was wounded in the battles around Fredericksburg, and spent a day in Libby Prison, has promised to give $1,000 to Richmond College, and another $1,000 on condition that $20,000 is raised.

IT is believed that Sir Edward Thornton, now Minister at Washington, will be raised to the rank of an Ambassador and sent to succeed the Earl of Dufferin at St. Petersburg. The post vacated by Sir Edward Thornton will be filled by the promotion of Francis Clare Ford, Esq., formerly Secretary of Legation at Washington, who succeeded the late Mr. G. Buckley-Mellenen in June, 1879, as British Minister to Rio de Janeiro.

THE wedding breakfast of Roland Bonaparte and Marie Blanc was served in fourteen salons communicating with each other, in the residence of Madame Blanc. The show of flowers was magnificent; roses and real orange-blossoms preponderated. In the first of the fourteen salons the bride and bridegroom and their families stood and received the congratulations of those who followed them from the church. Both of the Monaco heiresses are tiny little beings with immense heads of hair. The Princess Radziwill was in pink brocade, and the Princess Jeanne in blue and white. The latter is decidedly handsome.

OBITUARY.—Among recent deaths we note the following: Professor Wilhelm von Hamm, late Austrian Minister of Agriculture, aged 60; Colonel John W. Peard, "Garibaldi's Englishman," aged 69; Louis Charles Timbal, a well-known painter of religious subjects, at Paris, aged 59; Dr. Alfred Hudson, senior Physician in Ordinary to Queen Victoria, in Ireland, aged 72; Sir James Colville, the Scottish jurist, aged 70; Père d'Alzon, Superior of the Augustines of the Assumption, at Nimes, France; Dr. Edward H. Dixon, the well-known surgeon of New York City, aged 72; General Refye, inventor of the French mitrailleuse; Shigeo N. Sanesbima, the Japanese statesman, and Ambassador to France since 1874, at Paris; Judge Charles Fisher, D.C.L., ex-Premier of the Province of New Brunswick, and Judge of the Supreme Court, aged 71; Father Chambodut, late Vicar General of the Galveston (Texas) Diocese.

HON. JAMES L. PUGH, UNITED STATES SENATOR-ELECT FROM ALABAMA.—FROM A PHOTO. BY BRADY.

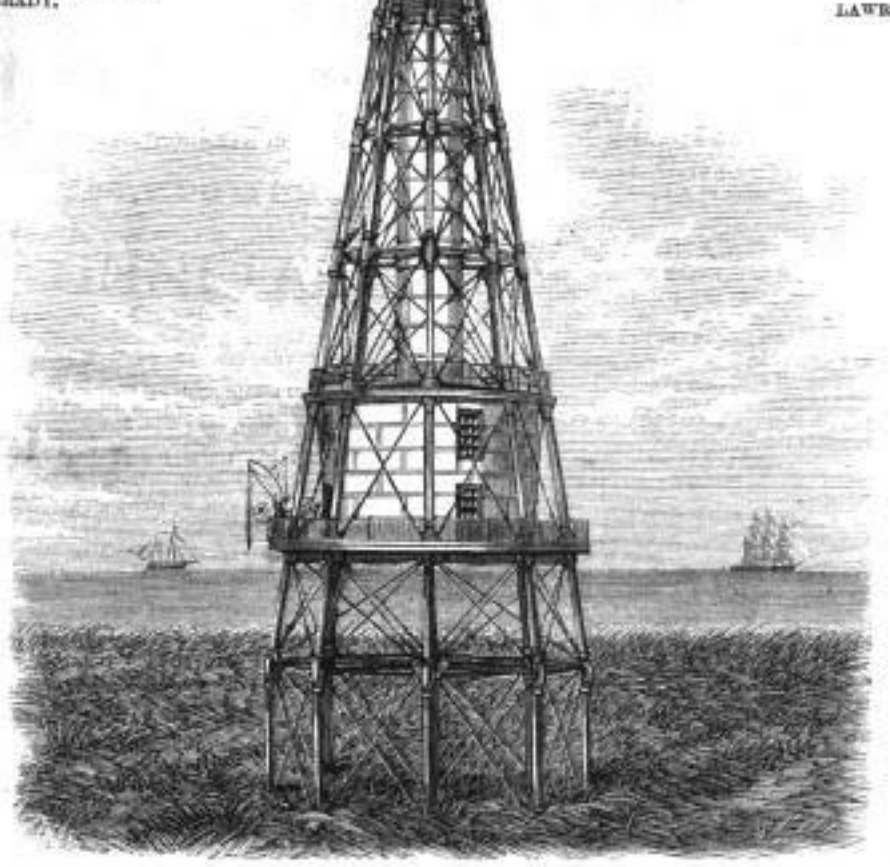
LAWRENCE BARRETT, THE TRAGEDIAN.

LAWRENCE BARRETT, the tragedian, whose portrait is given on this page, was born in New York in 1837. At fifteen years of age he was a linen clerk in a Detroit drygoods house, but, finding the employment uncongenial, engaged himself as a supernumerary at a city theatre at a salary of $2 a week. Studying industriously and conscientiously, he gradually made his way, until, after various discouraging experiences, he acquired a solid stage footing. One of his first successes was in playing Richmond to Couldock's Richard. From that time to the present, with the exception of brief service in the army during the War of the Rebellion, he has been constantly before the public. His first appearance in New York was in 1856, when he played Sir Thomas Clifford to the Jane of an inexperienced actress. His success in this part secured him an engagement at Burton's Theatre, where he became a favorite. Whatever is of interest in the subsequent career of Mr. Barrett may be briefly stated. He was manager of the Varieties Theatre in New Orleans during the season of 1863-64; in 1867 he visited England, where he was received with favor; in 1869 he became manager, with John McCullough, of the California Theatre, San Francisco; in the following year he played second to Booth at Booth's Theatre, and since 1871 or 1872 he has been before the public as a star. The most notable among the successes of Mr. Barrett have been in "Rosedale; Or, The Rifle-ball," "The Man o' Airlie," "Dan'l Druce," "Yorick's Love," Cassius in "Julius Cæsar," Richelieu. He will appear at the Park Theatre in New York City on the 20th instant in Howell's play—a translation—of "Yorick's Love."

The Rev. David Swing, of Chicago, in a recent article in the Alliance, of that city, says:

"The fame of Mr. Barrett is good in quality, being that of a careful student in his field of action. He has studied the aim and mission of the theatre, and has always studied well the highest need of the public. When he was reminded, a few weeks since, that he was to play in Chicago at a time when other great actors were also to be in the city, he answered that his heart was in the higher form of the drama, and that he would play in "Julius Cæsar" all week, come gain or loss—in the money sense. His taste must have its way. It happened that his taste was not unrewarded, for his house was all week good in size and most excellent in quality, reflecting not only credit upon the esteemed actor, but the taste of the city. It is almost certain that the style of Cicero was the popular style of his period, and that the stage eloquence we now see and hear in Barrett's Julius Cæsar is a good reproduction of that which moved the multitudes in the days of the tragedy; and thus this actor becomes a teacher of history, a lecturer in whose audiences there are no sleepy ones."

THE DISTINGUISHED DEAD IN SCULPTURE.



STATUE OF BLAISE PASCAL, FRANCE.

THE memorial statue to Blaise Pascal, the eminent French mathematician, author and inventor, who died in Paris in August, 1662, was unveiled in August last during a series of fêtes in the City of Clermont-Ferrand. The statue, which is the work of M. Guillaume, a member of the Institute, was erected on the plaza of Saint-Herem, an elevated piece of ground forming a grassy square, from which may be seen both sides of the chain of mountains. Pascal is represented sitting, with the head thrown forward, in the attitude of meditation. It is the thinker that one sees, with the great eyes, the ascetic physiognomy, that we are acquainted with through the many portraits which have been engraved of him.

At sixteen, Pascal wrote a treatise on conic sections. He was received into the company of scientific men who were by far his seniors. When a few years older he invented a calculating machine, which might have been a great success had he been favored with the mechanical appliances now available for the use of modern inventors. He also invented several vehicles, of different styles and uses, and engaged in many scientific experiments following on the discoveries and researches of Galileo, Torricelli and Descartes.

When about thirty, he withdrew from society and lived the life of a recluse, interesting himself greatly in theological questions. At this time the Port Royalists were vigorously upholding the doctrines of Jansenius, and Pascal threw his influence in behalf of their supporters. He interested himself in their quarrel with the Jesuits, and in doing so brought upon himself the bitter hatred of that Order. His "Provincial Letters," on this subject, made him famous. Their condemnation by the Pope in 1657, and the sentence of the Parliament of Aix that they should be burned by the public executioner gave these "Letters" a much wider circulation than they would otherwise have had.

For the four years preceding his death he was a continual sufferer, yet a diligent student and a prolific writer. His complete works have been published in two editions, and numerous biographies of him have been written.

upon the Taylor and Fillmore ticket in 1847. It will be remembered that Mr. Yancey and the State Rights Democracy took issue with General Cass upon the squatter-sovereignty views of that gentleman, and that General Taylor came very near carrying the vote of Alabama. The following year Mr. Pugh stood for Congress in his District, but was defeated by Henry W. Hilliard, who was then at the zenith of his brilliant career. In 1856 Mr. Pugh was successful as a Buchanan Elector, and in 1859 entered parliamentary life by election to Congress without opposition.

When the war broke out, Mr. Pugh joined the First Alabama Regiment as a private, and did his duty as a soldier until he was elected from the ranks to the Confederate Congress. He was again elected in 1863, and remained in Congress, at Richmond, until the surrender.

Since the war, Mr. Pugh has labored for the success of the Democratic Party, and on two occasions, heretofore, has polled a formidable vote for the Senatorship. According to the Mobile Register, "No man possesses in a higher degree the love of his neighbors and the respect of the people of Alabama. His personal appearance, his incisive and deliberate speech, his broad views of men and things, his amiable disposition, his purity of character, have for thirty years made him conspicuous in the narrow sphere of this State, and must render him illustrious upon the broader stage of national politics."

Politically, Senator Pugh may fairly be classed as a Bourbon. In a speech delivered after his nomination for Senator, he announced himself as a "representative man of the solid South—the glorious solid South." The failure of the Democrats at the late national election he ascribed to "short-lived and fictitious causes." He thinks, very justly, that the South "should shake off the delusion that there is magic healing, health and progress and prosperity in Federal office-holding." He then adds: "I hear some suggestions that we should abandon the Northern Democracy—that we should divide the solid South. Ah, gentlemen, it was never more important—there never was greater necessity for us to remain together as a united people. If we separate ourselves from the Northern Democracy we necessarily increase and intensify Northern sectionalism, and we will become the victims of sectionalism and centralism! Let us crystallize our solidity. Let us hold ourselves steadily and firmly upon the high, broad line of sectional pacification and harmonious

THE DISTINGUISHED DEAD IN SCULPTURE.—STATUE OF BLAISE PASCAL AT CLERMONT, FRANCE.

HON. JAMES L. PUGH,

UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

HON. JAMES L. PUGH, recently elected United States Senator from Alabama, was born in Burke County, Ga., Dec. 12th, 1819, and was four years of age when his father moved to Barbour County, Ala. At the age of eleven he was an orphan, beginning the battle of life with all the odds against him. He rode the mail route between Barbour and Henry Counties to earn money to enable him to attend school. He also served in a country store for several years. His intelligence and industry soon brought him to the notice of men of distinction. He read law with the late Governor John Gill Shorter, and for eleven years practiced successfully. Mr. Pugh entered politics as a candidate for Elector union! Let us carry out in good faith, and to the best of our ability, by the exercise of delegated power, all the great national objects for which our confederated Republic was established, as recited in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States. But, gentlemen, remember, and let it be proclaimed to the world, that under no pains or penalties or punishments will we ever surrender the invaluable right of local self-government. I shall, with your permission, go into the Senate of the United States and plant myself upon the Constitution with all its amendments and obligations. I shall fix my eye upon my rule of action as the Christian fixes his eye upon the holy cross. To thine own State and people be true, and, as the day follows the night, thou canst not then be false to any other State or section."

NEW BOOKS

THE FIRESIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POETRY. Comprising the best poems of the most famous writers, English and American. Compiled and edited by Henry T. Coates. Philadelphia: Porter & Coates. 1880.

Mr. Coates dedicates this admirable volume to his Alma Mater, Haverford College, and we have little doubt that it will secure an honored place in the College library. The selection is of the most happy, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," while the classification is of such a nature as to enable the reader to select as may best suit his mood. Poems of Home and Childhood, of Memory and Retrospection, of Love, of Patriotism, of Nature, of History, of Sentiment, of Satire—in a word, the whole gamut of "verse thought" is played upon, and with such harmony as to secure the success of this delightful volume. The illustrations are thoroughly artistic and the letter-press quite in keeping.

MY WINTER ON THE NILE. By Charles Dudley Warner. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881.

This charming book of travel will be read with avidity, and cause many a sigh to those who can only be Mr. Warner's compagnon de voyage—on paper. Telling his story after a fashion all his own, the author takes the reader across the Mediterranean and lands him at daybreak on the treasure-stored soil of Africa. Cairo is admirably described—its bazaars, mosques and tombs. The Pyramids are dealt with, and the chapter devoted to their description is all too short. The start up the Nile on the Dahabeah—"Rip Van Winkle"—is delightfully chatty, as indeed are the descriptions of the people on the banks of Old Nile, Christmas Day and Midwinter in Egypt. Thebes and her ruins are honored by more than passing mention, while the chapter "History in Stone" betrays warm archæological tints. Passing the Cataract affords scope for good description, as does also the Desert. Life in Ethiopia is full of color; in fact, there is not a dull chapter in the entire book, albeit Mr. Warner does occasionally gush a little on Egyptology. That arch scamp, the ex-Khedive, stands out in bold relief. He was then in the full pomp of power, and some anecdotes of his inner life form very enjoyable reading. This book is taken up with pleasure and relinquished with regret, and any person desirous of becoming intimately acquainted with Old Nile could not do better than Winter there with Mr. Dudley Warner, even though it be—on paper only.

AMERICAN POEMS.—Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, Holmes, Lowell and Emerson, with biographical sketches and notes. Holiday edition. Illustrated. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.

Mr. Longfellow, in this admirable compilation, leads with "Evangeline," Mr. Whittier with "Snow-bound," Mr. Bryant with "Sella," Mr. Holmes with "Grandmother's Story," Mr. Lowell with the "Vision of Sir Launfal," and Mr. Emerson with the "Adirondacks." The selection is admirable, the brightest leaf being plucked from each laurel-wreath. The volume is elegantly gotten up, and the illustrations of considerable artistic merit.

TO HOLIDAY PURCHASERS.

HOLIDAYS AT A. T. STEWART & CO.'S.

ONE of the sights of the world is the wondrous store of A. T. Stewart & Co's., on Broadway, occupying as it does an entire block, towering high over all the surrounding buildings, and standing more like the marble palace of a potentate than the busy hive of a commercial mart. Once across the massive portals, what a marvelous sight meets the eye! Color everywhere in gorgeous clois—from the India shawl, of a price that would cause Lord Beaconsfield's Neuchatel to pause, to the luminous ribbon plucked from the Lyons loom; from the Persian rug, with its wondrous yellow and emasculated reds, to the dainty hose from the spindles at Naturiggan—color everywhere, till the appetite of the eye becomes banqueted and the very voluptuousness of sight-gratification languidly asserts itself. A label of "the tongues of sweet women" greets the ear, from the shrill ejaculation to the soft; persuasive; from the "Ain't it quite too lovely for anything?" to the sorrowful "I guess I'll have to do without it." On all sides the "women of our native land" are chattering, gesticulating, selecting, rejecting, while the patient and courteous employés reveal treasures such as the rubbing of the lamp unfolded to Aladdin. Victims in the shape of fathers, husbands, lovers, too, are in plenty, and the look of triumph on the faces of daughter, wife or sweetheart, as they press through the incoming throng, tells of victory. Elevators are ascending and descending with unusual rapidity; cash-trucks fly from end to end of counters; small boys are driven to the verge of insanity by the incessant repetition of "Cash here"; floor-walkers cannot find vacant seats, while the magic word "Forward" ceases to produce the desired effect of procuring an employé. In a word, Stewart's in this Merry Christmas time is a sight worth traveling many miles to witness.

WHERE TO GET FINE CLOTHING.

JOHN WANAMAKER & CO., 818, 820 and 822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, is the leading clothing-house. For fine ready-made clothing they cannot be excelled in material and in make-up, and for measured goods—both in men's and boys'—their styles are unequaled. Mr. John Wanamaker, of The Grand Depot, senior of the firm—and the proprietor of the greatest drygoods house, except one, in America—gives his attention, and, with his junior brother, Mr. Samuel Wanamaker, who, with an able corps of assistants, gives his undivided study, turn out some of the most stylish goods, the prices of which are always within reason. Persons, from out of the city, ordering goods, can always depend on Messrs. John Wanamaker & Co.'s articles. Their beautiful store is well worth a visit, because, we say, in truth, a finer set of parlors for ready-made and measured clothing is not to be seen anywhere on this continent. They are well worth a visit.

ON A RECENT VISIT to the Laboratory of W. Champion Browning, M. D., of Philadelphia, Pa., we were amazed at its extent, surprised at the perfection of the machinery used, and at the exact mixing of every portion of the compounds of which the C. and C. CORDIAL, his TONIC and ALTERATIVE, and his ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, are made, and also the scrupulously neat manner of putting them up. Dr. Browning is a regular graduate of Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, and, in his profession, has been quite eminent for his skill and knowledge; he is a perfect "chemist," and his "Proprietary Medicines" must not be confounded with "Patent Medicines" that are in the market. Dr. Browning's preparations are put up in excellent style, each bottle having a small corkscrew, thus avoiding the breaking of the cork; it is one of the neatest contrivances ever used. The medicine we have knowledge of, and so far as its merits are concerned, can commend in the highest terms; his Cough Medicine cannot be excelled. Dr. Browning does not propose to cure every malady, but he tones up the system by his TONIC AND ALTERATIVE, and the Cough Medicine (the C. and C. CORDIAL) comes in perfect play.

DIAMONDS AND FINE JEWELRY.

E. KENTZMEN, manufacturing jeweler, No. 1311 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., has one of the handsomest stocks in fine and antique jewelry in the trade. His latest designs in Gold and Diamond Work cannot be duplicated (some portion) in this country. His Bronzes and articles of vertu are of the latest importations, and for Holiday and Christmas presents he is prepared to fill all orders promptly, and can be relied upon in every respect. Those who send from out of the city will get every article warranted and of the best.

IF society in our own day were able to boast as great a genius as Charles Dickens's Mr. Ledbrain, of the Yorkshire Mudfrog Association, in the dissection of statistics, we might, perhaps, learn how many roller blinds there are in use throughout the world, and what proportion the gross total bears to the five millions of HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING BLIND ROLLERS, which, it is asserted on good authority, are now in use. The invention is one of these happy "Yankee notions," especially devised to save labor, and, what is every whit as important, temper, for there are neither cords nor balances to break or get out of order, the working of the roller being altogether automatic.—London Furniture Gazette.

CHRISTMAS FRUIT CAKE.—Half a pound of butter, three-quarters of a pound of sugar, one pound of flour, one pound of currants, one pound of raisins, quarter of a pound of citron, four eggs, three-quarters of a cup of milk, two teaspoons of HECKER'S BAKING POWDER, mixed through the flour; mix butter (which must be soft) and sugar together, and break in one egg at a time. You must mix this cake with your hand. This cake can be kept from three to six months.—American Household.

With the January Number LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE enters upon a New Series—a change which is marked by many improvements and a material reduction in price. Maintaining the same high literary standard as in the past, but presenting

New and Attractive Features,

Rendering the Magazine somewhat lighter in character than hitherto, its conductors will spare no efforts to secure for it the distinctive reputation of a thoroughly

Popular and First-Class Family Magazine
OF LIGHT AND ATTRACTIVE READING.

Its new scheme will embrace a great variety of topics, giving special prominence to those that concern actual life, its interests, social aspects, and various phases, pathetic and amusing, presented in vivid pictures and graphic sketches. The list of writers will include many new contributors, fresh editorial departments will be added, and illustrations, carefully executed, will continue to hold a place.

The Best Christmas Present for your Class!

"THE LESSON CALENDAR." Every Sunday-school teacher will want to give to his or her scholars "The Lesson Calendar" for 1881. It is something entirely new, and will do much to secure lesson study at home. Hanging upon the wall of a scholar's room, it will be a daily reminder and help. It is in the form of a pad containing 52 leaves—one leaf for each week of the year. On each leaf stands out prominently the months, days of the week, and days of the month. There are also given the Home Reading for each day, the Memory Verses of the lesson, a few leading questions on the lesson, the Golden Text, and the Topic and Outline. The pad is placed upon a handsome cardboard background, which adds to the attractiveness of this new scholar's help. Price by mail, prepaid, 25 cents each. Sample leaves sent free. Discounts to the trade. Specimen copies of The Sunday-school Times, The Scholars' Quarterly, and The Weekly Lesson Leaf, sent free. Address, JOHN D. WATTLES, Publisher, 725 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

DARLINGTON, WIS., Sept. 25th, 1880.

Dear Sirs: I received the 32 cal. rifle you sent all O. K. I did not expect to get an octagonal barrel and globe and peep sights. I thank you very much for your fair dealing toward me. But I must tell you how the gun shoots. I fired five successive shots at a rest, 125 yards, and put every shot in a bull's-eye 1¾ inches in diameter. Three of the shots would be covered by a five cent nickel piece. I killed a hawk 350 yards the second shot. I am confident I could kill a deer with it three-quarters of a mile away. The gun is well balanced, and the workmanship is superb. I shall recommend the gun wherever I can.
Truly yours, EUGENE HALSTEAD.

The Melodette, or Automatic Piano,

The most marvellous mechanical invention of the age. It will play any tune that ever was written, in a melodious and pleasing manner. Difficult and simple music produced in a masterly style, and it can be played by a child as well as by a grown person, and will furnish music for social gatherings of any description, playing hour after hour, without any knowledge of music being required in the operation. The most wonderful of all musical inventions; a machine which is a purely mechanical manner produces any kind of music, Waltzes, Polkas, Marches, &c., &c., without any practice or knowledge of music whatever; in this respect far superior to any music-box, even though it costs many times as much, for there is no limit whatever to the number of tunes it will play. This Instrument is on a somewhat similar principle to the wonderful Phonograph, the perforations in a flexible strip producing the effect. It has just been perfected (the organs, carrying out showing it in its improved form), and is having the largest sale ever obtained by a musical instrument in the country. It has solid metal cams in imitation of green bronze; the notes or bars (the music producers) are metal, on same principle as a tuning-fork, which produce clear and most melodious notes, and never get out of tune; the bars are struck by strikers, the same as the wires are in a piano, only they work automatically instead of by the fingers. The strip of prepared paper in which the tune is stamped or perforated, is about 10 inches wide, and as it passes through the rollers and over the keys the holes so stamped through the perforations in the paper and strike the right notes; this is all done automatically, without any assistance from the operator (except turning the rollers), and the tune is played perfectly. It would be one of the most appropriate presents to make anyone, especially where there is no other musical instrument. Its expression is admirable, and its capacity or capability almost unlimited. Its selling faster than any musical instrument ever invented. The music is fine, and everybody delighted. The regular retail price of the Melodette is only $35, including a selection of popular tunes. Address, The Massachusetts Organ Co., 32 WASHINGTON STREET Boston, Mass., U. S. A., Sole Manufacturers. SPECIAL OFFER—Agents Wanted—We will a good Agent in every town, and big money can be made selling these instruments. We will send a sample instrument to any one willing to act as our agent, for $25.25, BOXED FREE, including usual price List, etc., and will give territory. Order at once. $50 a week easily made. We have 150 testimonials.

Perfect Clothing, and Clothing that isn't Perfect.

We have been trying for ten years to make the most perfect clothing we could make from day to day. Not how much we could turn out, nor for how little money, though we look out sharp for both; but how perfect, how faultless, how better this year than last year. For some years we didn't try to do anything but cultivate perfection. We didn't make anything at a low price; we didn't make much at medium prices; we got to making a great deal at high prices—high compared with common work; not high compared with the finest work outside. Now we are doing precisely the same thing, and a great deal more besides. We are making finer clothing than we ever made before this year, simply because we have grown up to it—learned how. We are also making large quantities a grade, or two, or three lower; we make a good deal, not as low as we can, but as low as it is worth anybody's while to buy. The result is that our clothing is for you, whoever you are; for you, whether you wear the most perfect clothing you can buy, or the least costly, or anywhere between the two. HOLIDAY SUPPLEMENT
FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by J. W. ENGLAND, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,317.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, DECEMBER 25, 1880. HOLIDAY DOUBLE NUMBER.

Deacon Weston's First Christmas.

By JANE G. AUSTIN.

"I'LL have no Popish doings in my house, Christmas or no Christmas, and so I tell you, Harriett Phillips."

"Harriett Weston, if you please, father," replied the person addressed, making a sudden movement across the room and kneeling beside the armchair where Farmer Weston sat, nursing his gouty foot upon a stool.

The young woman was tall, slender, and comely, with the steady hazel eyes, wide chin, and clean-cut lips that tell of decided character, and the capacity to rule or to submit as the will may direct.

The old man was tall also, but neither slender nor comely, for his form was gnarled and bent like one of the ancient cedars of his native New England coast: his face was tanned to the color and texture of old parchment, his mouth was hard and obstinate, and his eyes full of that wary anxiety which at seventy years of age has become the habit of life with men who wrest a living from New England soil.

As his handsome daughter-in-law knelt beside him, and clasping her firm, white hands upon his arm, looked up in his face, the farmer nestled uneasily to the other side of the chair, and replied, in a peevish tone:

"Well, Harriett Weston, then, though I must say the doings you talked of were a good deal more like your own folks than your own's."

"Are they? Why should they be?" asked Harriett, demurely; "wasn't the birth of Christ as great a blessing to Presbyterians as Episcopalians? And if so, why shouldn't they seem just as glad on Christmas Day?"

"I don't know as I've said they shouldn't, have I?" retorted the old man, testily. "But what I do say and what I mean is, I ain't going to have any Popish crosses and wreaths and fixings generally put up in my house. I should look to see my father and grandther rise right out of their graves, let alone my gran'ther's grandther, who came over here o' purpose to get away from Popish tyranny and wickedness. It's all well enough for you, seeing your father's a minister, and I suppose holds to all the English ways of his Church; but I tell you, girl, I'm going to hold to the ways of my own people and my own religion."

Without reply Harriett got up and arranged the cushion under the gouty foot, mended the fire of hickory logs, swept up the hearth, and, taking some sewing from the table, began stitching diligently at the sleeve of a dressing-gown she had planned, and was helping Mehitable to make for the invalid. Presently she began to hum softly, and the former, who had tried to read, tried to think, tried to doze, and failed in all, said, with elaborate carelessness:

"Sing out, can't ye, Harry? I love to hear you sing."

"It's only an old hymn, and I dare say you know it," replied Harry as carelessly; and with a rich contralto voice began to sing—

"While shepherds watched their flocks by night,
All seated on the ground."

Before she had finished the verse, a grum rumbling noise from the armchair reminded one of the rocks and cedars that responded to Amphion's melody; and by the time they came to—

"Good will henceforth from heaven to men Begin and never cease"—

the bass tones almost overpowered the mezzo, and, united, they filled the wide, old kitchen and echoed back like fairy music from the array of burnished tin upon the dresser. The stamping of snowy feet in the porch heralded a newcomer, and as the voices blended on the last note, the door was thrown open, and a good-looking young fellow tramped into the room, his arms full of small branches of hemlock, arbor vitæ, and ground pine.

"Bravo, father!" exclaimed he. "I haven't heard your voice come out so since you left the singing seats when I was a boy. I tell you, this girl of mine can make old folks young and dumb folks rejoice."

"Oh, I always was one to sing psalms when others did. Paul says for all Christian folks to do that," replied the father, a little shamefacedly; and the son heartily assented with—

"That's so, father; Paul and you are about right. Well, Harry, my girl, here is some of your green stuff to go to work on, and there's plenty more at the barn that I'll fetch as it's wanted."

"I'm sorry you had the trouble, Dick," replied Harriett, steadily, "for we're not going to put up any greens. Father thinks it's best not."

"Ho!" exclaimed the son in dismay; but a warning look from his wife checked any further expression of discontent, and he was stooping to gather up the branches already heaped in a corner, when farmer Weston, clearing a throat somewhat husky from its late exertions, in a sort of off-hand style:

"Oh, I don't say but what you can do as you've a mind to in your own room, Harriett; and the fore-room, too, is more yours than our'n now. Mother won't never go in there again, poor soul, till she lays in the middle of it, where all her children but two have laid, and one of 'em had better have been there. Yes, you may do as you like in the fore-room and your own room, children, though I'd a leetle rather you didn't put anything up to the windows, on account of the speech of people, I being a deacon so, and all."

"Oh, thank you, thank you, father!" exclaimed Mrs. Dick, coming to kiss the narrow furrowed brow, that actually reddened under the salute; "and you may be sure I will put up nothing that can show from the outside. I am so much obliged, for it would have seemed sad enough to do nothing for Christmas. I don't doubt those shepherds did something in the way of rejoicing."

"Well, I'll go back to the barn, old lady, and when I come to dinner I'll bring a lot more branches. If you want me before, just blow the horn at the back-door, or let Mehitable run over and tell me."

But long before dinner-time—in fact only a very short time from his departure—Dick Weston opened the kitchen-door and looked in with a face strangely blanched and altered from its previous ruddy joviality. His wife sat on her own side of the fire deftly tying the sprigs of evergreen into thick, firm bands, of which any sort of festoon, trimming, or wreath could be readily formed, and the old man at the other side of the fire, his bony hand shading his eyes from the blaze, watched the graceful work with a smile of placid content. It was a pretty picture, but Dick did not pause to contemplate it, but, passing through the room to the passage at the front of the house, summoned his wife with a look as he passed behind his father's chair. Quietly brushing the greens from her white apron Harriett obeyed, and not until they were well out of hearing, did she exclaim, "What is the matter, Dick! You are as white as a ghost!"

"A ghost!" echoed the young man, laughing nervously. "Well, no wonder. Come up to our own room and I will tell you."

Ten minutes later Harriett re entered the kitchen to take a warm shawl from its peg, slip her feet into snow-boots and throw a knitted fabric, called a rigolette, over her head. The farmer watched all these operations with interest, as he did all his daughter-in-law's movements, and presently asked:

"What now, Mrs. Dick? Going out?"

"Only to the barn, father," replied the young woman, careful not to turn toward him her glistening eyes and burning cheeks. "I have a new idea for my Christmas decorations, and am going to see what Dick has out there. You said I might do what I liked in my own room and the parlor."

"Yes, whatever you like, so that you don't bother me. When are you going to finish that stuff?"

"Oh, pretty soon. Is it in the way? Shall I carry it up-stairs before I go out?"

"No, no; I'd just as lief you'd sit there and do it. It don't trouble me none, and pleases you."

Truth to tell, it was something more than not being bothered; it was a positive pleasure to the crippled old man to see that shapely figure and blooming face seated opposite him, to watch the white, strong fingers at their work, and listen or join in the Christmas hymns and carols the clergyman's daughter had for so many years sung and taught in her parish choir. So, as the minutes passed into half an hour and an hour, and still her chair remained vacant, the old man grew restless, impatient, and finally downright cross. Mehitable, who was baking pies in the brick oven of the outside kitchen, looked in from time to time, now at him, and now at the paralytic wife, who lay so patiently in the bedroom, opening into the front kitchen, and had lain since Christmas three years before, when she was stricken down, body and soul, by what her neighbors justly described as a shock. But to all Mehitable's kind, if somewhat independent, offer of refreshment, amusement, or conversation, the farmer returned but surly answers, and presently inquired:

"What on earth is Mrs. Dick doing out to the barn all this time? She'll get her death o' cold, and there'll be another one laid up, and who's to nuss her?"

"Oh, Mrs. Dick! She came in quite a spell back," replied Mehitable, craning her neck at the window to try to see the barn door. "Run round to the front o' the house as spry's a fox, and straight up-stairs. Well, I declare for't, there's Mr. Dick, with a whole lot o' green stuff on the sled, and Bill hitched up, and he's a driving of it round to the front. What's that fer?"

"Oh, they're a fixing up their own room for Christmas: I give 'em leave," replied the old man, testily. "You'd better go in and see if Mrs. Weston don't want some gruel or something."

"I was in just this minute, and I guess I'd better squint into the oven first," replied the "help." "Seems to me I smell them pies a scorchin'."

Just before dinner-time Harriett again appeared, her face radiant, her voice jubilant, and, gathering up her greens, heaped them all into a basket. The surly deacon, absorbed in the week-old newspaper, never raised his eyes, but presently found a glass at his lips, while his daughter-in-law's blithe voice declared:

"Here's your medicine, father. Half-past eleven and more. You must get up an appetite for dinner."

"Much you care whether I do or not," grumbled the deacon, yet took the draught, and then sat watching the graceful form moving so swiftly, yet so deftly, around the room, laying the table for dinner, arranging the curtains to screen the sunshine from his eyes, gliding into the bedroom to say a few cheery words to the patient invalid, and then back to add some symmetrical touches to Mehitable's somewhat slap-dash style of putting dinner upon the table. Then she ran to the back-door to blow the horn for Dick, who presently appeared, shivering with cold and cleanliness. The stern demand for blessing was uttered by the deacon's lips, and the meal proceeded, Harriett's first care being to prepare a dainty tray for Mrs. Weston, who dined under Mehitable's superintendence at the same time, thus sparing the feelings of that young woman, who, until Harriett's arrival, had sat at the table with the farmer and his son, and fancied that she had, herself, instituted the present arrangement.

"Timothy has dressed the turkey for to-morrow, Harry," remarked her husband. "A good ten-pounder it is, and as tender as chicken."

"I guess them shepherds didn't have turkey for dinner, nor think of it," said the deacon with a grim smile, as he turned to his daughter-in-law."

"No, but they could feast their eyes and ears and did it," replied she. "They were more glad than we, and we try to imitate their joy with our evergreens, and our good dinner, and our happy hearts and faces."

"Easy enough for them to be happy that have nothing to worry them," replied the old man, with a sigh that was almost a groan; and Harriett, rolling her chair back to the hearth-corner, softly sang:

"Hark! the herald-angels sing
Glory to the new-born King;
Peace on earth and mercy mild,
God and sinners reconciled."

"You don't know nothing about it, child, not the first thing," muttered the old man, clasping the fresh, young hand in his bony and callous one; "God and sinners ain't reconciled so easy as all that."

"No, father, dear," returned the girl in a whisper, "but after Christmas comes Good Friday, and after the cradle the Cross." Then she turned again to the table and hastily carried some articles into the pantry whence she presently came, with a basket, showing some branches of evergreen at the top. The old man watched her jealously.

"Now, what are you going to do?" asked he. "Why don't you come and sit down and tie your evergreens here?"

"I will, pretty soon, father," replied Harry. "But I have something to do up stairs first, and then Dick is coming to help me in the parlor. You'll let us take you in to see the decorations, when they're all ready, won't you?" The old man nestled in his chair, scowled, and muttered something incredible, but the next moment Harry was kneeling at his chair arm, the pretty hands clasped upon his breast, and those clear, brown eyes fixed beseechingly upon his.

"You'll come with the shepherds and your children to welcome the Christmas baby, won't you, father dear?"

"If it'll do you any good, da'ter, I'll go in and look when it's all fixed," replied the deacon, a smile softening his rugged features like Christmas sunshine.

Harry rewarded him with a kiss upon the brow and went her way. Presently the deacon heard his son's voice guiding Bill, the white-faced farm-horse, round to the front door, and then Harry's blithe tones, directing, as it seemed, the bringing in of some large objects that scraped noisily against the sides of the doors.

"Sakes! What be they doing out there?" demanded Mehitable, pausing, with the table-cloth gathered in both hands, and turning her head over her shoulder.

"Fetching in trees to fix up the parlor," replied the deacon, as composedly as if he had arranged the whole programme. "Wonder if there was evergreen trees around that 'ere stable."

"Round the stable? You don't mean to say Mr. Dick's been cutting down the trees round the stable! Well, well, well! New lords make new laws, and that's a fact. That's Mrs. Dick's work, now!"

"I reckon your work's out in the wash-room, and you'd better be seeing to it there, Mehitable Joyce," replied the deacon, in an irate voice. "If every one in this house was as particular to foller out my wishes as Mrs. Weston is, things would jog a little easier."

"My sakes!" exclaimed Mehitable, slapping down the leaves of the table, and setting it up with a bang. "I'm glad Mrs. Dick's such a favor-ite, I'm sure. I only hope it'll last, right along." With which charitable aspiration Miss Joyce slammed the door, and was heard revenging her wounded dignity upon the dishes, which she washed with such vehemence that they had good need to be of stout delf, or they had never survived to bear the Christmas turkey. The deacon listened with an ugly scowl, and glanced angrily at his swathed foot; but from behind the door, at his other hand, rose Harry's blithe voice:

"'The Holly and the Ivy
Now both are full well-grown;
Of all the trees that are in the wood,
The Holly bears the crown——'

"I wish we had more of it, deacon! Pity it doesn't grow in New England, and has to be bought with a price!

"'The Holly bears a blossom
As red as any blood,
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ
To do poor sinners good.

Chorus.

"'O the rising of the sun,
The running of the deer,
The playing of the merry pipes
Sweet singing in the choir;

"'The Holly bears a bark
As bitter as any gall;
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ
For to redeem us all!'

"Where did I get that? Oh, it's an old, old English carol. I know ever so many of them. Did you ever hear—

"'I saw three ships come sailing in
On Christmas Day, on Christmas Day;
I saw three ships come sailing in
On Christmas Day in the morning.

"'Pray whither sailed those ships all three,
On Christmas Day, on Christmas Day?
Pray whither sailed those ships all three
On Christmas Day in the morning?

"'O they sailed into Bethlehem——'

"And so on through nine verses. And then there is—

"'A Virgin most pure, as the prophets do tell,
Hath brought forth a Babe, as it hath her befell,
To be our Redeemer from death, hell and sin,
Which Adam's transgression had wrapped us all in.

"'Rejoice and be merry, set sorrow aside;
Christ Jesus, our Saviour, was born at this tide.

"'In Bethlehem city—in Jewry it was—
Where Joseph and Mary together did pass,
And there to be taxed, with many one mo',
For Cæsar commanded the same should be so.

"'Rejoice and be merry, etc.'"

"There! That's just right. Now go, like a dear child, and bring the little branches, and don't forget your hammer and nails, and I'll run up for the curtains. Oh, it will be just splendid when it's done, deacon, won't it?"

A moment's interval followed, broken by a soft sound, at which the deacon grimly smiled, and leaning back, with a dreamy look upon his face, fell a-musing of his own young days, when, for a little while, soft words and softer kisses, and merry laughter and light hearted singing, had been the atmosphere of these old walls, so still and sad of late, with the wife of his youth lying stricken there, and his own health broken, and Dick away so much of the time, and— But at that point the cloud settled back upon the narrow brow, and smiting the arm of his chair with a clinched fist, the deacon muttered:

"No wonder the sunshine all went out of this house when Satan came in; no wonder Susan got a stroke, and I broke down all to once! It's all very well to say you'd ought to be reconciled and all, but——"

"Our swelling pride to cure
With that pure love of Thine:
O be Thou born within our hearts,
Most holy Child Divine."

So sang Harry, and the deacon unclinched his hand and, folding it within the other, lay back in his chair looking so sad, so lonely, so broken, that Mehitable, coming to put wood on the fire, relented, and said, not unkindly:

"You look kind o' forlorn, deacon. Can't I get you nothing?"

"No—no," replied the old man, drawing his hand across his eyes, "Well, you might push my chair into the bedroom; I guess I'll talk to mother a spell. Maybe she's lonesome, too."

So Harry, glancing like sunlight into the kitchen presently, found it empty, and, hearing voices from the bedroom, went and peeped in, drew back and thought for a moment, with finger on lip, then quietly fetched the big Bible with pictures in it, and carrying it in, laid it upon the foot of the bed, open at the second chapter of St. Luke's Gospel.

"Don't you want to read a little to mother?" asked she, gently, of the old man. "I am so busy or I would."

"I'd just as lief," replied the aged deacon, with alacrity: and, putting the old silver-bowed spectacles astride his nose, began the chapter, while Harry went out to Mehitable in the back-kitchen to make a confidential communication, at which Miss Joyce forgot her anger, jealousy, and all sorts of uncharitableness, in pure joy, not unmixed with a good deal of human delight, at a mystery and an event.

"Yes, indeed, Mrs. Dick," exclaimed she, wringing out and snapping the last dish-towel, "I'll help you every way I'm able, and main glad o' the chance. Seems kind o' keeping Christmas in 'arnest, don't it?"

"Yes, keeping the soul as well as the body of it," replied Harriett, with a far-away look in her brown eyes.

The short December day waned, and in the twilight the young wife and her husband came to sit beside the hearth with their father, who had returned to his corner, and sat meditatively staring into the fire, which, freshly fed with dry fuel, sent its great banner of flame flaring up the wide-throated chimney, rejoicing in its own fashion that Christmas Eve had come again.

Dick, too, was very silent, furtively watching his wife, whose bright face was paler than its wont, and whose ordinarily steady lips and calm eyes showed unaccustomed nervousness and anxiety; even the white fingers so strongly interlaced upon her knee spoke of some deep emotion powerfully repressed. The deacon was first to speak.

"Can't you give us another of your Christmas hymns, daughter?" said he. "I don't know as I ever thought or heard so much about Christmas as I have to day."

But Harry's voice and heart were not attuned to carols just then, and she softly sang, to a quaint, yearning old tune:

"There is a stream whose waters rise
Amidst the hills of Paradise,
Where foot of man hath never trod,
Proceeding from the Throne of God.
Oh, give me sickness here or strife,
So I may reach that Spring of Life!
There is a people who have cast
All strife and toil away at last—
On whom, so calm their rest and sweet,
The sun shines not nor any heat;
Give me with these at length to be,
And send me here what pleaseth Thee."

A long silence followed the last sweet note, and then Mehitable bustled in, and tea was ready.

"Well, when am I going in to look at your doings in the fore-room, Mrs. Dick?" asked the deacon, as his chair was rolled away from the table.

"Very soon, father," replied Harry, cheerily. "I am going now to finish my preparations. Mehitable, you will come pretty soon, won't you?"

"Just as soon as I've done up the dishes, and I can rattle them off in no time, if I set out."

"Hope you'll rattle some more out'n the store when you've smashed all those," suggested the former, with a grim smile, which, with the jocose remark, proved him to be in a state of unwonted hilarity.

But it was nearly two hours more before Dick appeared in the living room, as the kitchen of ceremony was called, and announced that all was now ready, and he had come to wheel his father's chair into the fore-room where Harriett awaited him.

"I'd most forgot about it. It's about bed-time, ain't it?" disingenuously replied the deacon, who had done nothing but watch and listen for an hour past. But as his chair was wheeled into the parlor and the door softly closed behind him, all affectation of indifference vanished, and Deacon Weston came as near profanity as ever in his life, for he exclaimed, "Good Lord, deliver us!" and did not mean to quote the litany.

No wonder he was surprised. What was this place into which he had entered by the familiar door leading to his own kitchen? Not the fore room, whose staid and comfortless arrangement was so familiar and so uncongenial to his eyes.

A heavy curtain screened off nearly all the space before him, and about him lay almost total darkness, through which the voice of an unseen singer rang merrily out:

"O sing me a carol blithe and free,
And fit for our Christmas morn:
For the world is as cold as the world can be,
Though its Lord on this day was born.
'Tis a wintry time for the rich and poor,
And who shall be turned from a Christian's door?
For 'twas Winter-time for the rich and poor
When the shepherds came to the stable-door."

"Yes, Winter-time," went on the voice, speaking out of the darkness. "But the shepherds forgot the cold and misery of the frosty night, for they had seen the Angels, and they told them how the Glory of God had appeared on earth, and Peace and Good will were to reign among men. And when they asked where should this Glory and Peace come to sinful men, they were told from the Cradle of the Babe of Bethlehem, and they might go and worship there. So, through the cold and darkness they came, the angel guiding them, past the houses of the rich and comfortable, past the door of the inn where was no room, until they came to the cave where were stabled the ox and the ass, and there, in a lowly manger-bed, they found a little Baby."

At the word, the curtains slid softly aside, and the deacon, rubbing his eyes in astonishment, saw a grotto, its doorway hung about with icicles and snow-wreaths, its walls hidden in masses of evergreen, which also carpeted the floor.

At the back, between two spruce trees, appeared the heads of an ox and a horse, contentedly munching some hay.

A powerful yet soft light, its source unseen, flooded the place, and in the centre, in a wooden trough filled with straw, lay a sleeping child, his little hand clasping a lily. A lovely child, whose features, distinctly seen by that strange light, reminded the deacon of a boy on whom he once had rested more of pride and hope than belongs to any creature, and on whose still face he had twenty years before wept in this very room such tears as sear the eyes that weep them.

"And when the shepherds saw that Baby," went on the voice, in a tone of tender awe, "they remembered the words the angel had said to them, 'Ye shall find the Babe wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and lying in a manger,' and they fell on their knees and worshiped God, singing the Song of Angels."

And at the word, the unseen voice swelled into a note of ecstasy, and with it joined another deeper voice, and yet another, broken and tremulous with sobs, and all shouting:

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men!"

As the strain died away, a figure muffled from head to foot in black, glided upon the scene, and, kneeling at the foot of the cradle, bowed her face upon her hands, while the sound of suppressed sobs stirred the air and mingled like a minor strain in the melody of the speaker's voice.

"A poor lost child, wandering in the cold and darkness of that Winter night, heard the shepherds as they sang, and heard the wondrous promise of peace they proclaimed; so she, too, drew near to the lowly manger and kneeling at the Baby's feet she said in her heart, 'I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, yet forgive me, not for my own sake, but because the Babe of Bethlehem has come to bring peace upon earth. Forgive as He forgives!'

The baby, wakened by the shepherds' song, lay cooing in his cradle, and looking about him with the dewy, lustrous eyes of infancy, the lily in his hand gently waving like the very ensign of peace.

With a swift, impulsive movement, the kneeling figure started to her feet, snatched the child to her heart, and in a moment was kneeling at the old man's feet, holding up the smiling baby, and sobbing:

"For his sake, father—for his sake!"

The deep hard sobs of age mingled with her own, and as the baby, crowing with some mysterious joy, laid his tiny grasp upon the wrinkled face bent over him, the deacon laid one hand upon that bowed head, and one upon the baby's brow, and said:

"The Lord bless and forgive you, my child, and forgive me for my hardness of heart."

Then from behind the trees glided Harry, her carols all quenched in happier tears; and after her came Dick, and knelt beside their sister, and Mehitable's angular figure appeared in the background, and, her voice strangely softened by tears, exclaimed:

"I'nite us in prayer, deacon; for if ever folks was called to give thanks for Christmas, it's us."

But all that the deacon found to say was:

"We thank Thee, oh, God! For this, my child, was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found!"

"And now, daughter Harriett," said he, presently, "for your reward you shall go and tell mother yourself. Dear heart! but she'll be glad."

So glad, that the shock went far to undo the mischief of that other terrible shock three years before, when it was discovered that her only daughter had fled in the night from her father's house, following the fortunes of an unworthy adventurer, whom her father had sternly forbidden his house, and never from that day to this had he mentioned her name, nor had the poor mother knowledge even of her child's life or death, honor or shame; for when a letter came, in her handwriting, the deacon sternly laid it upon the fire unopened, and watched till it was consumed. So the joy of receiving back her darling was intensified by the lifting of an awful terror from the mother's heart, and, as she kissed her girl again and again, she murmured:

"I'd have forgiven you all the same, my precious; but I'm so glad you're an honest woman."

"And I'm so glad," added Harry, wiping her eyes, "that father forgave her and blessed her before he knew whether she was or not!"

"Ah! son Dick!" exclaimed the old man, as he heard her, "you did a good thing for this house when you brought this daughter into it. It's she that's done it all. Come, now, my girl, give us one more of those Christmas songs to dry up all these tears, and then we'll to bed."

"Wait until I go and take poor Daisy and Bill back to their stable," said Dick, anxious in his own way to bring down all these excited brains to every day. "Just fancy, mother, those poor creatures with their heads in at the open window, eating hay in your front-parlor as genteely as you please!"

"Lor', Mr. Dick!" interposed Mehitable, dryly, "you needn't think there's nobody round but you. I made Josh Tomkins carry them critters away jus' as soon as the deacon was trundled off. They're all safe."

"Then listen, and I'll sing you the best carol of all, and one of the very, very oldest!" exclaimed Harry, blithely. And, dancing the boy upon her knee, she sang, in a strong, ringing voice:

"'From far away we come to you,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
To tell of glad tidings strange and true;
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
For as we wandered far and wide,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
What hap do you deem should us betide?
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
Under a bent, when the night was deep,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
There lay three shepherds tending their sheep.
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
"O ye shepherds, what have you seen—
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
To slay your sorrow and hush your keen?"
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
"In an ox-stall this night we saw,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
A Babe, and a Maid without a flaw:
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
There was an old man there beside,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
His hair was white and his hood was wide;
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
And as we gazed this thing upon,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
These twain knelt down to the little One,
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
And a marvelous song we there did hear,
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
That slew our sorrow and healed our care—
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.
News of a fair and marvelous thing;
The snow in the street and the wind at the door,
Nowell! Nowell! Nowell we sing!
Minstrels and maids stand forth on the floor.'"

Cherry Wagner's Secret.

A STORY OF CHRISTMAS.

By J. Esten Cooke.

CHAPTER I.

CHERRY WAGNER was standing at her small looking-glass, tying up her hair. It was Christmas morning, and the sunshine was a glory on the snow. You could see it everywhere, through the little dormer window of the little garret-room of the rambling old homestead, on the slope of the mountain. It was deep on the window-sill and the steep old roofs, on the cedars bending under it, on the fences, the ledges of rock, and the fringe of sycamores along the river.

In the fireplace a merry crackling seemed to welcome the happy season, and the ruddy glow lit up the figure of Cherry—the neatest and coziest little figure in the world, clad in a brown woolen dress, and much plumper than any partridges in this bleak season. Her cheeks were rosy, and her smiling lips like her namesakes—the cherries. Face and figure, and the very brown curls she was tying with the pink ribbons behind her white neck, seemed to have caught the glory of the sunshine and the warmth of the fire, and to throw them both, quite into the background.

A twitter came at the window, and Cherry turned her head. The snow-birds she fed every morning were begging for their breakfast, and a voice from the small bed, in one corner, cried:

"Birdie! birdie!"

A youth of four or five was sitting up, with tumbled curls, rubbing his eyes and laughing.

Cherry ran to him and caught him up, hugging and kissing him, and placed him in his chair in front of the blaze. She then hastened to the window, opened it and threw out some crumbs, and, returning to baby, set about dressing him. It was quite delightful to see the motherly air with which she parted his curls, and brushed them back from the forehead, and kissed him exactly between his laughing blue eyes, laughing herself. Then she took him by the hand and led him down the narrow old staircase into a sort of hall, into which the rooms of the ground floor opened. On the wall there was a huge pair of deer antlers supporting a long rifle; a solemn old clock ticked behind the door, and Cherry, glancing around her as if she was fearful of being observed, opened the door of the old clock and looked in furtively. A smile brighter than the sunshine lit up her face, and with "Baby" she entered the breakfast-room.

There never was a more cheerful sight than the plain old breakfast-room of the plain old homestead, with its great wide fireplace and roaring hickory logs, which threw a ruddy light on every object. The whole room seemed to rejoice in it—the home-made carpet on the floor, the split-bottomed chairs around the table, the sideboard, the plates, the cups and saucers, and the old bound dozing serenely in front of the blaze. Above all, the light and warmth fell on the wonderful Christmas-tree, which rose from its bank of evergreens on a table in one corner. The evergreen boughs were decked out with gilded stars, and candy cornucopiæ, and little presents of needlework for each one of the family; and peeping from the foliage was a gorgeous red-bird whose open wings hovered grandly above all these wonders. The honest Wagner family were going to have a merry Christmas, it seemed; and Baby was so much overwhelmed with excitement that he essayed to make a rush at the magical tree and capture it. Cherry cried, "No, no! Baby," and caught him up and covered him with kisses; in the midst of which two sturdy old fellows, of about sixty, came into the room—Father Wagner, as everybody called him, and Uncle Hieronymus, his bachelor brother. It was only necessary to glance at the old fellows to see that the Wagners were from Fatherland. They were big, burly Teutons, with ruddy faces and honest eyes, and three generations in America had not altered the Rhineland look in them. Only Uncle Hieronymus professing to be a philosopher and somewhat of a cynic, occasionally scowled.

Cherry ran up to them and kissed them one after the other.

"Christmas gift, father, dear! Christmas gift, uncle!"

"Kismas gift!" Baby cried, after the manner of echo.

"Christmas, nonsense!" cried Uncle Hieronymus. "I'm hungry! I want my breakfast! Come here, you young man of the name of Baby. What do you mean by making saucers of your eyes?"

Baby came to the cynic with his head turned over his shoulder, gazing at the wonderful tree, and submitted with indifference to being kissed. Being released, he made a second rush at the tree, but Cherry once more captured him and, catching him in her arms, bore him out, with intent to perform her duties as mistress of the Wagner establishment.

Father Wagner was standing in front of the fire, looking at a picture on the wall—a plain photograph of a middle-aged dame, in a plain walnut frame. The face was smiling and motherly, but his own was very sad as he looked at it.

"Another Christmas and no Martha, brother," said Father Wagner, sighing. "It is harder and harder to do without her."

"And without Harry, too," said Hieronymus, looking at another picture opposite—that of a bright-faced young fellow of about twenty, also a photograph. "Everybody seems to forget Harry, but I remember him."

He ejaculated the words with a grim expression, rubbing his knees in the chimney corner, where he was seated. Father Wagner's ruddy face suddenly grew stern and hard.

"So that picture is hanging there yet," he said in a low voice. "It is not taken down."

"Certainly, it is there!" growled Uncle Hieronymus, knitting his brows, "and it shall stay!"

"What right has it to be there?" cried Father Wagner, in sudden wrath. "What right had that boy to disgrace an honest family, and make us blush at his bearing the name of Wagner?"

"All nonsense! I don't blush! What, if Harry was wild—he was not bad!"

Father Wagner's face grew sterner than before.

"You do not know, brother," he said, in a low, deep voice; "he not only brought shame on his family by his wild ways—he did more—he disgraced us and has ruined us."

His voice faltered, and almost a groan mingled with the words.

"Don't believe it! What do you mean? You can't turn me against Harry!"

"He forged! It was not only drink and cards—I could have borne that. He forged Wharton's name to a check for two thousand dollars! I gave a deed of trust on the farm to have it hushed up, and Wharton notified me that he will sell us out in March."

Uncle Hieronymus sat like a figure of stone. An acute pain might be read on his lips and knit brows. Then he burst forth suddenly, with immense wrath and in strident tones:

"I don't believe a word of it! It is a lie of Wharton's! He is a skinflint, and for little I will wring his neck!"

"It is true!" groaned Father Wagner.

"Truth or lie, it makes no difference! I, for one, don't mean to forget my boy, or turn against him! He is dead—that settles all scores; dead, saving his comrades in that mine in Colorado! No matter what he did, he was my Harry!"

There was something sublime in the exultation of Uncle Hieronymus. He had not known this fatal charge against Harry before. The poor boy had fallen into bad company; had become dissipated and contracted gaming debts which his father had been compelled to pay; then father and son quarreled and parted. The boy had wandered away and was lost sight of until the intelligence of his death in the mines came; and it was only after his departure that Father Wagner had been informed of the forgery, and given the deed of trust which was now to ruin him.

It was a sad discussion for this bright Christmas morning, but the appearance of breakfast put an end to it. Cherry came in with the coffee-pot, and a grinning maiden followed with smoking dishes, and after family devotions, which Father Wagner read gravely from a huge Lutheran book of prayers, they all sat down and breakfasted. Over the meal Baby presided, flourishing his spoon in his high chair, but Cherry was the soul of everything. Such a sunshine beamed from her rosy face, and such a rush of laughter mingled with her voice whenever she spoke, that Father Wagner quite forgot his depression, and even the cynic Hieronymus melted, and did not growl more than three times during the whole repast.

The time for Cherry's breakfast seemed not to have come yet. She was busy arranging a waiter on which she placed choice bits from every dish on the table. Having fixed the whole to her satisfaction, she looked at the waiter approvingly, and taking it up carried it into the room across the passage.

In a small bed there, beside a cheerful fire, lay a boy of about eight. He was thin and white, and his eyes had a very sad expression; but at sight of Cherry his face lit up with a tender smile.

"I've brought your breakfast, Willie!" cried the girl, in her cheery voice, and she placed the waiter on the bed beside him.

"You are so good, sister," the boy said, affectionately. "I wonder what makes everybody so kind and good to me."

"Good gracious, what a question!" cried Cherry, laughing. "Because we love you——"

"And I am a sick boy—oh! I wish I could get well, sister."

"You'll soon be well now, dear," she said, propping him up with pillows, and kissing him. "There now, dear, eat your breakfast—but I quite forgot! Christmas gift, Willie?"

The boy put his thin arms around her neck, and, drawing the rosy face down to his own pale, little one, kissed her tenderly.

"I wish I had something to give you, sister," he murmured. "And if somebody would only give me the Christmas gift I want."

"What do you want, dear?"

The dreamy eyes of the sick boy seemed to be looking thousands of miles away.

"I want big brother!" he said, half in a whisper.

Cherry turned away her head, and her bosom heaved suddenly, as if there was a weight upon it.

"Oh! if only big brother would come back!" murmured the boy, with tears in his eyes. "I think of him all the time, but most at Christmas. He was so good to me, and I loved him so—how could I help loving him? He used to play with me—on the floor sometimes, big man as he was—and often I lay awake for hours and hours, sister, thinking of him and wanting him!"

The voice of the sick boy faltered, and his eyes swam. He seemed to be looking at something beyond the walls of the room.

"There's another thing I think of—what I read in that paper, sister," he went on, in a low, hushed voice. "I read it over and over, and I know it by heart. You know where it was—the name of the place was Sangre de Cristo, and it was in a country called Colorado. There was a gold mine, and the water got into it and was filling it fast, and some men were down there, and somebody had to help them."

The boy's face flushed slowly; he seemed to be looking upon the very scene.

"Nobody would go," he went on in the same faint, awestruck voice, but a man came running and jumped in the bucket that had a rope to it, and said, 'I'll go down!' and it was brother!"

He sobbed and shook, and would not stop, in spite of all that the girl could do to quiet him.

"It was Brother Harry, and he went down in the deep mine, hundreds and hundreds of feet down, where it was dark and the water was rushing—and he got the poor men out and staid last—and never came back! It was all in the paper!—they called him 'The Hero, Harry Wagner!'"

The boy stopped, sobbing convulsively, and Cherry, almost crying too, could only hold him close with his head upon her bosom, and tell him over and over that it was wrong to excite himself so.

"I can't help it, sister! How can I help crying for brother?" he faltered, with a look of hopeless sadness in the eyes turned up to her.

"But you mustn't think of this on Christmas Day, Willie; it makes you so sorrowful; and you know it is our duty to be happy at Christmas! There, there, dear; don't cry. Look how bright the sunshine is! I do believe that cedar is going to break down under the snow! There are the snow-birds hopping about and looking for something to eat. What funny little fellows! Do you know, Willie, they come to my window regularly every morning for their crumbs, and you just ought to see them how they fight—the little wretches!"

Cherry laughed so merrily as she described the scene that the sick boy forgot his troubles, and a faint smile came to his face.

"Now eat your breakfast, dear; it is getting cold," she said; and she went back to her duties in the breakfast-room.

It was the habit of this good Lutheran family to go to church on Christmas mornings and, leaving Uncle Hieronymus to look after the children, father and daughter set out on horseback for the meeting-house, some miles distant. They were not in reality father and daughter—Father Wagner and Cherry. She and Baby were the children of a poor cousin who had died some years before; and as their mother was also dead, Father Wagner had adopted them. After a while he seemed to have forgotten that they were not really his children—and as to Cherry, she was not only the joy of the whole household, but its autocrat.

"You are growing very tall, daughter," said Father Wagner, as they struggled through the snowdrifts in the narrow mountain road. Then he added, with a musing look: "I am afraid you will marry and go away from me some day."

"Marry! Indeed I won't, father, dear!" cried Cherry.

"You are nearly nineteen—maids marry at that age," quoth the old fellow, sadly. "And then something might happen."

He was thinking of the deed of trust, and looked much depressed; but Cherry only replied, with her eyes dancing:

"What could happen? Besides, no one would have me!"

Father Wagner shook his head.

"No fear of that. You might pick from a dozen." He stopped and suddenly added: "What do you say to Dick Wharton? He was wild, but people say he has reformed, and he might suit you."

Was Father Wagner thinking that a marriage between the girl and young Wharton would put an end to all trouble about the deed? Wharton, senior, was wealthy, and his son was his idol. In a business point of view the match was everything to be desired, and young Wharton had been one of Cherry's most assiduous suitors. She had flatly refused him, and did not seem to have changed her mind now.

"I would not marry him if my life depended upon it, father!" she cried.

Her face flushed and she spoke passionately.

"He was the cause of—the cause of—you know—but for him, our Harry——"

She stopped and burst into tears; and for some distance they rode on in silence. What Cherry meant to say in these broken words was that Harry Wagner had been led into evil habits by Dick Warton; and it was plain that Father Wagner understood her.

"Well, well, daughter," he said, with a sigh, "we'll say no more about it. And, to be plain, I am of your way of thinking about that young man."

After this no more was said, and they soon came to the church—a small stone building half-covered with ivy in a hollow of the mountain. The service was already in progress and ended in an hour; whereupon Father Wagner and Cherry went about greeting their neighbors and friends. There was always some news to hear at these friendly gatherings, and Father Wagner was informed of the accident which had befallen young Wharton. He had been thrown from his horse and seriously injured, perhaps fatally. On their way back home father and daughter spoke of the accident. Cherry looked quite sad.

"I am sorry I spoke of him so unkindly," she said, "but they say he will recover; I am very glad."

They were passing directly beneath a great holly tree which leaned from a rocky ledge above them. The scarlet berries in the deep green foliage were dazzling in the sunshine. Cherry pointed to them and said:

"Here is what you wanted, father dear, to dress the pictures."

"You mean—your mother's picture," he said, in a gloomy voice.

"Oh father! father dear!—both pictures—for love of me!"

He had broken off a large bough of the holly covered with berries.

"You will let me, father—he loved me so—and I loved him."

Her face flushed and her eyes filled with tears.

"As you will," he said, in a low tone, with his head bowed. Cherry leaned from her saddle and placing her arm around his neck laid her cheek upon his own.

"Thank you, father!" she murmured, smiling through her tears.

The sun was sinking like a ball of fire toward the mountain as they came back to the old homestead, and the great fire was roaring in the fireplace as if in triumph. The air had grown chill and the snow-laden trees waved in the fitful gusts; but the big log fire only roared the louder and laughed as though full of the wassail of Christmas. The very red-bird perched on the Christmas-tree seemed ready to burst forth in a carol of rejoicing.

Father Wagner went in to see Willie and Baby as he always did, and Cherry was left alone with Hieronymus.

"Oh uncle, dear!" she cried, running to him, "both pictures are to be dressed!—both, uncle!"

Hieronymus grunted. The holly boughs were lying on the table and he looked at them.

"So that's all arranged, is it? I meant to dress both! What do I care for anybody?"

Cherry was laughing and crying.

"I knew you had not forgotten him," she said.

"Forgotten Harry? Why should I forget him? What do I care what people say? He was my boy, and the best boy that ever was! Wild!—harum-scarum!—what if he was? Backbiting and hating and oppressing poor people—that's respectable. But if a poor boy is thoughtless—to the dogs with him!"

Uncle Hieronymus was withering, his scorn superb. He gesticulated and scowled defiance.

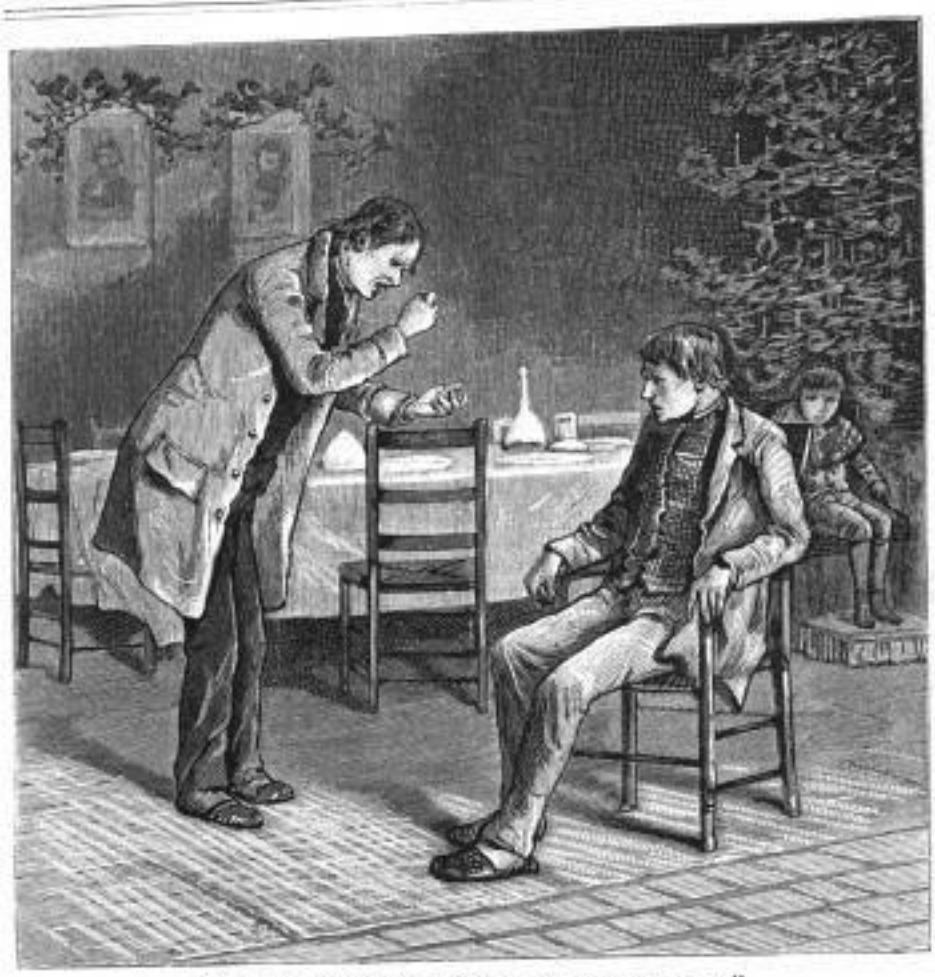
"Did the preacher to-day say anything about a certain Prodigal Son? I know some people who would have set the dogs on him when he came back home—the good man fell on his neck and kissed him. There's the difference!"

Cherry ran and clasped the cynic in her arms.

"You always loved him, and he loved you dearly," she said.

Whereat the cynic, allowing himself to be embraced, retorted:

"Somebody else loved him, too, and he loved somebody!"



At these words Cherry grew to be the color of a red rose, and Uncle Hieronymus smiled in triumph.

"You thought I had forgot that, or never knew it! As if a man with eyes in his head could live in the same house with two such people and not see what is going on right before him!"

"Oh, uncle!"

"Come, deny it if you dare, you young slip of original sin!"

CHERRY WAGNER'S SECRET.—"I SET THAT SEAT."

"The idea!—and I only a child!"

"A child of sixteen!—and that's a diabolical age or I'm a sinner! Don't try to deceive me, young one—it's of no use. Have I said you were wrong? Do you think I blame you for loving Harry? You know you fell in love with each other, and would have been married if—if——"

Uncle Hieronymus suddenly broke down and sobbed.

"At least I won't forget him!" he suddenly cried, going straight to the table where the holly was lying. In a turn of the hand he had dressed Harry's picture, and the frank bold face looked out from a bower of evergreen and scarlet. Then he turned his back and dressed Mother Wagner's picture too—not observing that Cherry had flitted from the room to the clock without. Opening the door of the old heirloom, she took out something and hid it in her bosom, and ran back just as Uncle Hieronymus had finished his work.

"Now, that's something like," he growled, to hide his emotion. "What's the matter, young one?"

For Cherry's face was like a burst of Spring sunshine.

"I have a secret to tell you, uncle, dear!" cried the girl.

"What a face!—a secret?"

"Yes, yes, uncle!—for you only!"

She ran and hid something carefully—she had taken it from her bosom—in the evergreens, over the young man's likeness.

"What are you doing?" cried Hieronymus in a state of utter bewilderment.

"I am putting father's Christmas gift where he will find it after dinner."

Uncle Hieronymus began to tremble.

"Is the girl mad?" he cried.

"No, no, uncle, dear!—it is my secret—and you shall know it!"

CHAPTER II.

AS the sun sank below the mountain it began to snow. First a few feathery flakes drifted slowly down; then the flakes fell closer and closer as the moments passed on; and at last a blinding wall interposed between the eye and the shadowy cedars looming up, dim and weird, against the blood-red sunset.

Father Wagner had gone out as usual to the stables to see after his stock. He never trusted his dumb family to the care of the farm-laborers, but saw in person, before nightfall, that the horses were fed and bedded, the cattle munching their fodder, thrown from the great rick over the stone fence, and the sheep under shelter and nibbling their good supply of hay from the mow above their heads. This had once been Harry's care, but now it was Father Wagner's—he would not allow Uncle Hieronymus to assist, because he was rheumatic.

Cherry's private interview with the cynic lasted but a few minutes. At the end of that time she ran out of the room, disappeared in the direction of the kitchen, and coming back to Willie's room began to dress him, for Cherry had set her heart upon having Willie at the Christmas dinner. This was not imprudent, for the boy sat up for an hour or two every day. So the girl dressed him neatly in his small Sunday suit, with warm striped stockings, put a woolen comforter around his neck, and, wrapping him in her shawl, carried him bodily into the dining-room, and sat him down in a wadded chair in the chimney-corner. Baby had already made his appearance, in full-dress, for the occasion. He was lying on the carpet in front of the fire by the old hound, and drawing on a scrap of paper a picture of a black sheep. Having put the finishing touches to this work of art, he rose and declaimed:

"Back sheep, back sheep,
Have oo any wool?
Yes, my mistress,
Free bags full——!"

and Cherry, for reward, caught him up and danced him aloft until he burst into shouts of delight.

The snow was falling more and more heavily as night came, and Cherry looked out of the window anxiously. First she looked toward the stables and then at the dim waste of snow down the slope of the mountain.

"Where can father be?" she said.

A stamping on the porch seemed to reply to her. From her position she could not see in that direction, and her heart gave a throb; you could almost hear its beating. All at once the door opened and Father Wagner came in. His face had a strange expression, and something had evidently startled him.

"What is the matter, father?" cried Cherry, laying her hand on her heart as if to calm its throbbing.

Father Wagner looked at her with an expression of wonder, but he only shook his head and sat down with a deep sigh in front of the blaze.

Cherry stood for a single moment looking at him with flushed cheeks. Then she turned away and went to see that the lamps were lit and the Christmas dinner placed upon the table, which was set and waiting.

Father Wagner had not moved a muscle since he fell into, rather than sat down in, the chair in front of the fire. There was no light as yet in the room but the firelight, which flashed out and fell again and cast long shadows and lit up with sudden gleams the old furniture and the Christmas-tree and the pictures on the wall. The ruddy face of Father Wagner had never lost its expression of wonder and depression. Something had evidently moved him deeply, and more than once a heavy sigh shook his frame as he gazed into the fire. Without the snow was falling steadily and a wind had risen and began to drive it. Was it the wind or the hands of goblins that shook the window-sashes and the cedar-boughs without? All around the old mountain-house weird voices seemed to be laughing; and suddenly a rush of wind drove the snowwall sidewise and shook the house.

Father Wagner started from his reverie and raised his head. At the same moment the fire flashed aloft in a ruddy blaze which filled the whole room with rejoiceful light. The old man turned his head, and his eyes fell upon the pictures; from under the evergreens the face of his son seemed to be looking at him and smiling. Thereat the broad breast heaved and he looked away, fixing his eyes upon another object—an additional chair at the table.

"What is that?" he said, pointing to the additional chair.

Uncle Hieronymus seemed to have been waiting and burst forth.

"I set that seat!" he thundered, standing up and gesticulating. "What I want to know is this: Are we Christians or heathens? Is that Book you read from the rule to live by, or is it a lie? There's a leaf in it all about a Prodigal, who was a hard subject. He spent his substance and his father's in riotous living and was not a model for anybody. Then he went down to the gutter and fed on husks! But he came back home at last, and his father forgot all. He forgave the boy and cried over him and set him on his right hand. Are you going to be a heathen, Jacob Wagner, and not do likewise?"

Father Wagner shook, and a groan came, but he made no reply.

"Answer me!—don't sit there, dumb!" cried Hieronymus, in triumph. "You harden your heart against the boy and even scowl when people who loved him set a chair at the table to remember him by! What's the harm of that? If it gives a body pleasure to think the boy might come and sit in it—if an old boy of the name of Hieronymus Wagner is made happy by it and says to himself 'There might be a miracle, and Harry might come back——!'"

Suddenly Willie turned his head and rose to his feet, tottering and fixing his eyes upon the window.

"What is the matter, little one?" cried Father Wagner, starting up.

"There was something, somebody!—there, father!—there!"

Was it a shadow at the window, and was the wind without laughing with a wild air of triumph?

A light flashed into the room—Cherry was hastening in with the lamp; and on her face might be seen an expression of joy which lit up the room more than fire or lamplight.

"Father, dear!" she cried, setting down the lamp and running to the old man.

"Daughter!" he exclaimed, "what does this mean? Are you all mad?"

The wind or something else burst in the broad front-door, and the snow followed it. Father Wagner drew back a step, looking with wide-open eyes upon what met his sight.

A tall figure, half-covered with snowflakes was standing in the doorway—a man with a broad hat, under which could be seen a bold face, with frank eyes and heavily bearded lips—the face flushed and beseeching, but with a splendor of joy in it.

"Don't you know me, father? I was not dead—I have come back! You'll forget and forgive—won't you, father?"

He came in, trembling and gazing around him. As he advanced Father Wagner stood looking at him with a vague wonder, as if the whole scene were a dream.

"You'll forgive me, father?"

Suddenly Willie ran toward him and held up his arms, crying, "Brother Harry!"

And Harry caught him up and came to Father Wagner's side, and, still holding the child to his breast, said:

"Father!"

The single word was more eloquent than a thousand.

The stubborn will of Father Wagner broke down at once; his face was wet with tears, and in a moment he was holding his son close and weeping over him. Suddenly, Uncle Hieronymus burst into rejoiceful laughter.

"I always said you would come back, young man!" he cried, "and you are just in time to dine with your family. So you forged a man's name and went off and got drowned, did you? No matter! It's all the same! Hold him tight, Willie—he's a ghost, and he'll get away from you!"

To describe the joy of Hieronymus would be a vain undertaking, and that cynical philosopher struck the keynote of the general rejoicing. Harry Wagner was seated in front of the fire, in the midst of all, and the first thing he said was:

"I am not a forger, uncle; and I've not drowned!"

"Do you mean to say it's really you, big brother!" cried Willie, quite wild with joy. He was still in the young man's arms, and Baby was on the other knee. "Then you didn't go and get drowned in that mine, as the paper said!"

"Not a bit of it, Willie," the big miner replied, laughing. "I was lost for a day and a night, as the rope broke and they had to send for another; and that's the way the story got out, I have no doubt. After a while they got me up—and, after all, it made my fortune. A great operator took a fancy to me and made me his head man—and so there's the end of that story, Willie!"

"But that forgery!"

It was Uncle Hieronymus who asked the question. His air was severe, and he waited after the manner of a judge.

"Well," Harry said, fixing his eyes with deep feeling on Father Wagner, "I never even heard of that charge until two weeks ago. Then a man who had come West from the mountain here told me of the report. It nearly ran me crazy, father!—what could it mean? It was miserable enough in me to act as I did, and quarrel with you, but to be charged with forgery!—even to have it whispered about! I did not stay at the Sangre de Cristo two days after hearing about it. I sold out everything, put the gold in my pocket, and came straight back and settled everything!"

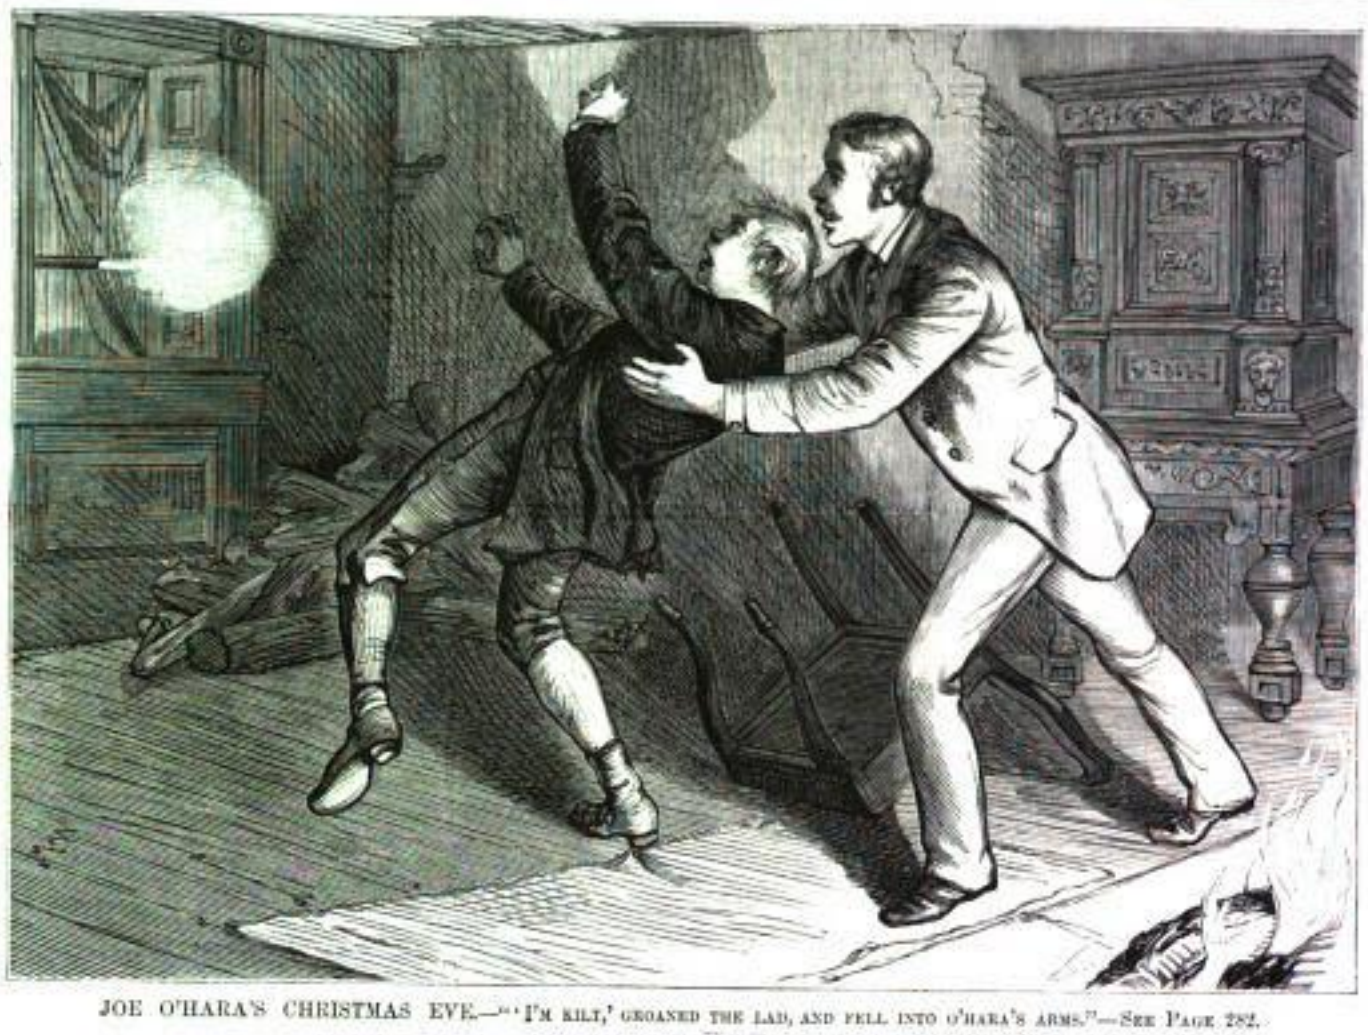
"Ah! you settled everything!" cried Uncle Hieronymus, with sarcasm.

"In half an hour, uncle! There was no trouble about it. I learned that the forged check had old Wharton's name on it—and then I remembered all about it. Dick Wharton gave me the check one day, when I was going to town, and asked me to get the money for it; and I did get the money and paid it to him the next day. He forged his father's name and, like a wretch, left me under the charge. I made him confess it—or, rather, he did so of his own accord when he thought he was going to die. He had been thrown from his horse—it was nearly a week ago—and he signed the confession on my promise to tear it up when I had shown it to you, father. Well, that's all—except that I looked around and met Cherry in the grove, and gave her the papers. She ought to have them somewhere, as she's a business young woman. I say the papers, father, because your deed of trust is with the other. It is my Christmas gift!"

Cherry had darted to the picture and taken from the evergreens what was concealed there. It was a package and Harry opened it, and held up two papers, one of which he gave to Father Wagner, who read it and returned it.

"Thank God!" he exclaimed. "I never could believe it in my heart, Harry!"

"Well, that's done with now, father! As to the deed of trust, that cost nothing! As you gave it for a debt which I never contracted, old Wharton returned it, and begged me to say nothing of it. I had money enough. Your bad boy has come back home with something to spare, and I hope you'll not find fault with him in future, father!"



Suddenly Uncle Hieronymus advanced and spoke:

"There is only one guarantee for such a wretch's good behavior! Bachelors are not respectable—I am an exception, but there are few. It will be necessary for you to marry if you wish to be received back into this respectable family. Are you prepared to fulfill this condition, young man?"

Harry Wagner blushed from his chin to the roots of his shaggy curls over his forehead, but it was easy to see that it was a blush of happiness.

"Are you prepared to undergo the ordeal?" demanded Hieronymus, severely.

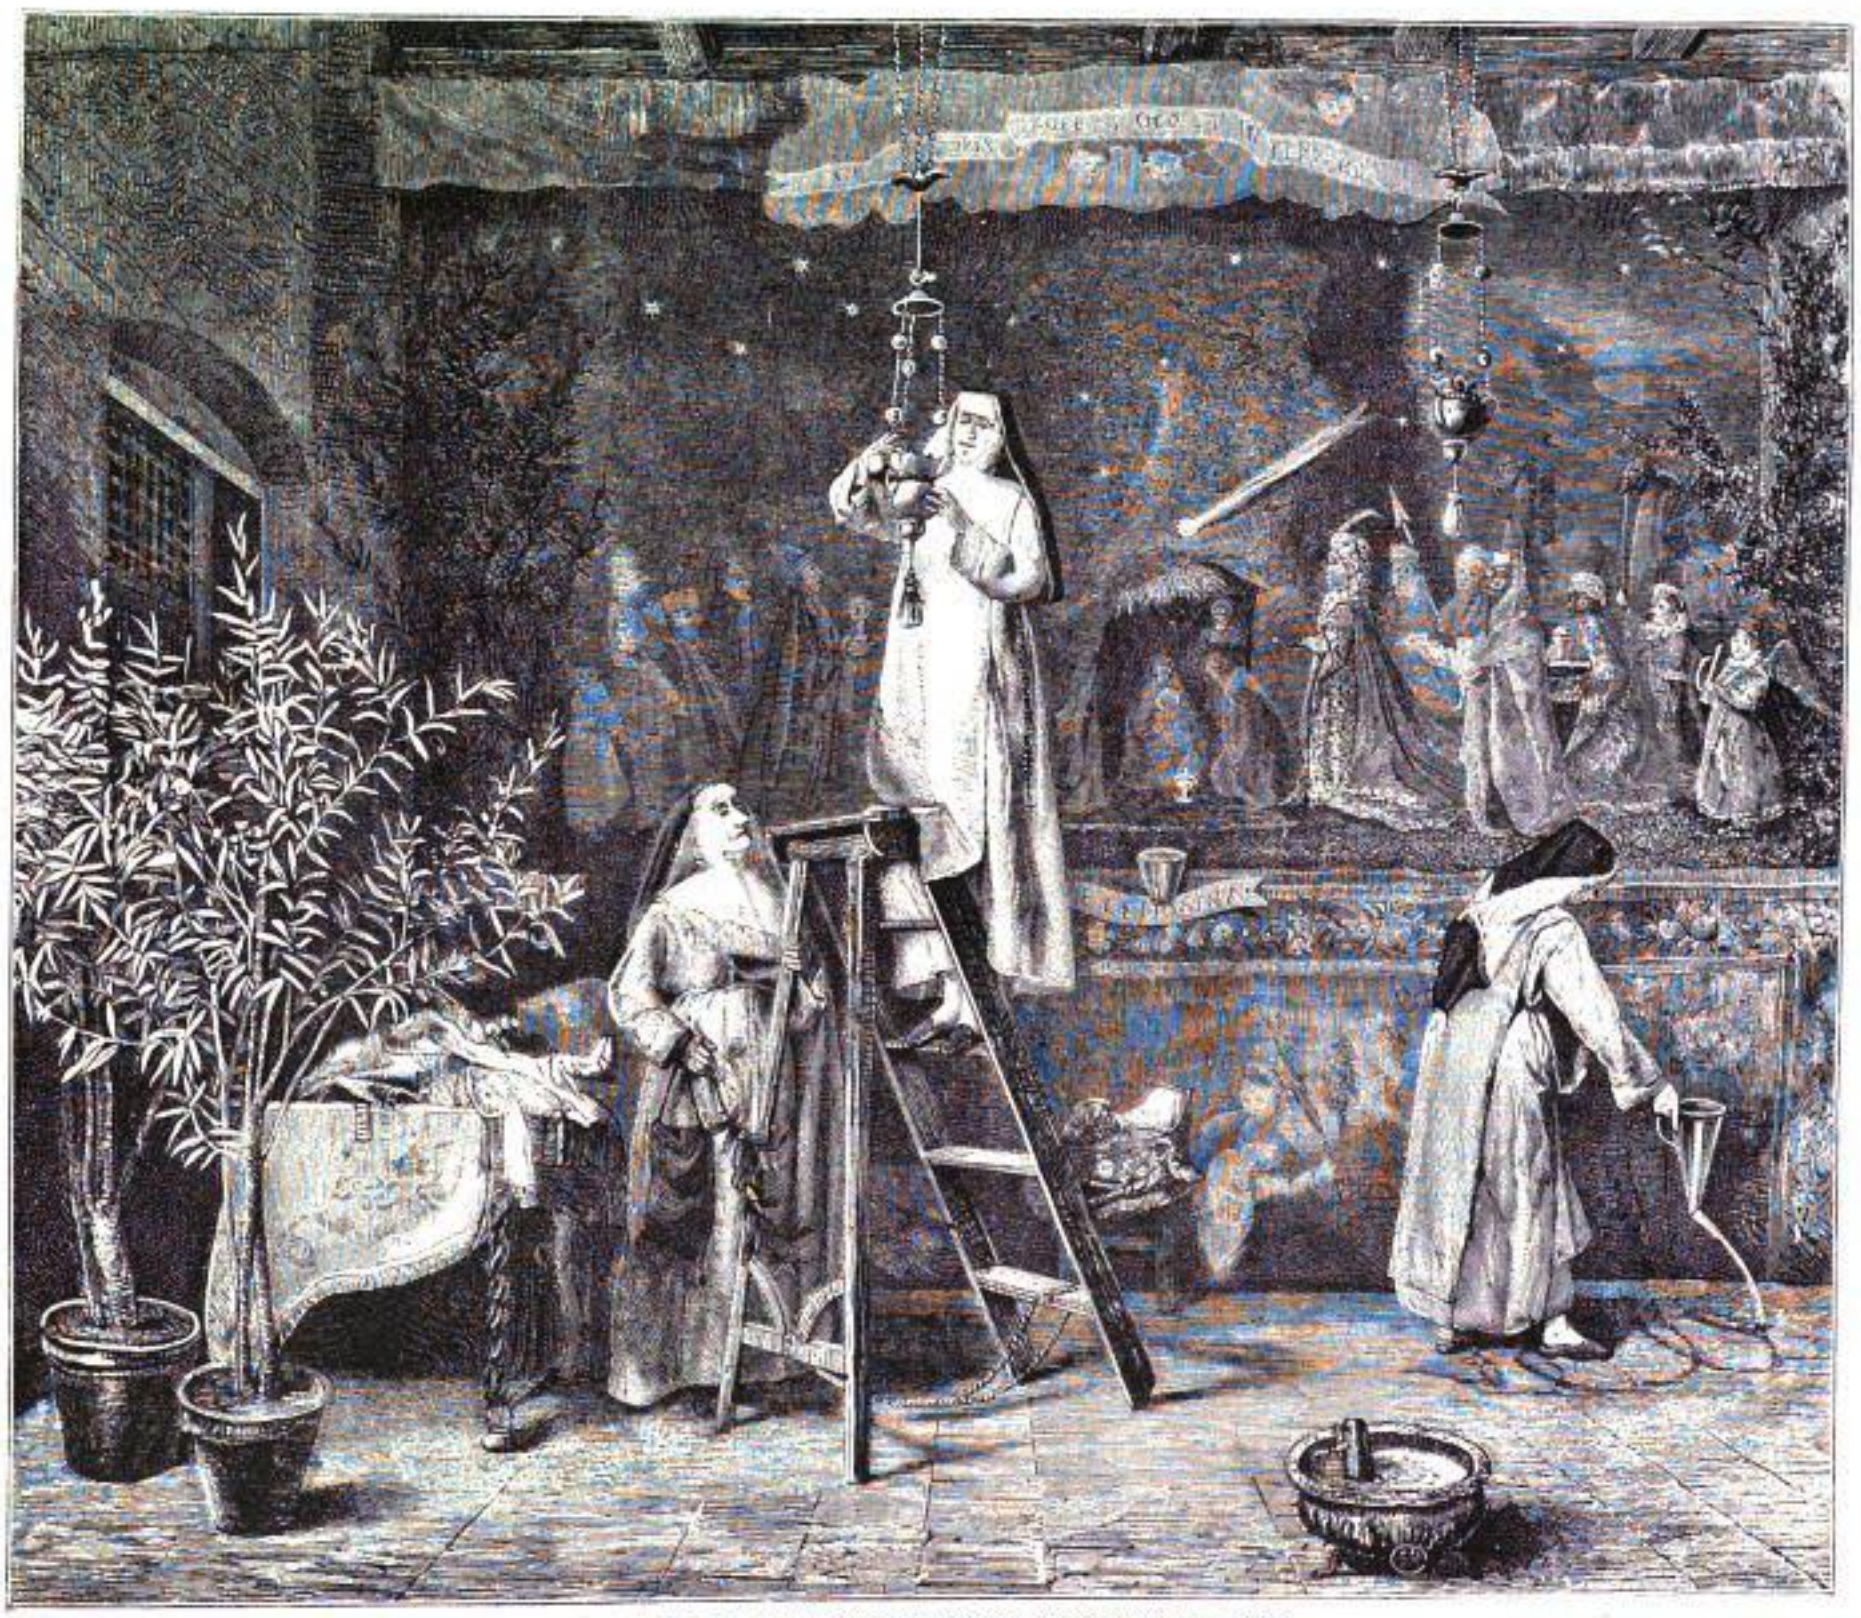
"I am, if I can find anybody to marry me!"

"Look around—do you see any one you think will have you?"

Harry Wagner started up and looked at Cherry with an expression on his bold face that was dazzling.

"Will you, Cherry?" he said, "but you—you have already promised!"

And before Cherry could resist he put his arms around her and, turning to Father Wagner, said:



"I am engaged to be married to Cherry—may I have her, father?"

There never was before, and probably never will be again, such a Christmas at the home of the Wagner family. They had at one end of the dinner-table a huge roast turkey, a round of beef at the other; chine and ducks at the side; a mighty pudding and beer and home-made wine. And Willie had his seat beside big brother, next the fire; and Baby grew wild at the appearance of the plum pudding; and when all was cleared away, and the fire heaped high once more with logs, Cherry—blushing still with her overflowing happiness—lit the tapers on the Christmas-tree, and Baby's eyes were suddenly saucers, and the red-bird nearly burst into a flood of song. As to the wind and snow without, they were quite forgotten. Were not the very cattle housed and fed that night, by Harry himself, before Father Wagner went to feed them, and the very halters tied in the old knot that Harry tied, seeing that Father Wagner had fallen into a great wonder? But now the wonder was turned to joy, for there was his lost son before him, with Baby on one knee, and Willie packed upon the other, and one hand of the bearded miner holding secretly the hand of Cherry.

A Christmas Crib in the Chapel of a Convent.

IN Catholic convents and institutions, and in many of the Catholic churches even in this country, part of the Christmas decoration is the "Crib," a representation of the grotto of Bethlehem, with figures of Mary and the Infant Saviour, and St. Joseph, and also the legendary ox and ass, who figure as spectators in all the early popular accounts. These are always seen; sometimes, too, the three wise men with their retinue, their camels and attendants, are seen approaching, guided by the miraculous star, and one of the three is always black. The children and the young are intensely interested in the whole affair, and in a convent chapel the good Sisters use all their taste and means to produce a most vivid effect. Women's deft fingers and sense of the beautiful are full of resources, and the shimmer of lace and the candle-light falling on glittering ornaments, the rich exotics borrowed from the hothouses of friends, the costly fabrics garnered up in the long fleeting years, all help to make it an impressive sight. Where a simpler taste prevails, the little Babe of Bethlehem is represented alone, lying on straw, and lights and lace and flowers surround the effigy.

Before the crib or Child is always a place for offerings, and when Christmas comes, the priest day by day takes the offerings and goes with some of the children to distribute them among the needy and the poor. The offerings are not all money Children are encouraged to give up some of their treasured presents as offerings to the poor, and these are sold at an impromptu auction to obtain money for the work of charity.

A strange medley is thus sometimes seen before the figure of the Child—toys, delicacies, books and plaything.

Once a good Sister coming in found a child seated there, helping herself to the dainties with great serenity. The Sister rebuked the young offender and endeavored to impress it with a sense of the enormity of its course. "I always offered him some," the child whimpered, "but it would not take any."

CHRISTMAS EVE.

COMES softly echoed down the ages,
The song the shepherds heard of old,
Like strain of sweetest choral music
Along cathedral arches rolled.

First heard on earth in nightly vigils,
On lone and dark Judean hill,
The chorus since of countless millions,
Of peace on earth, to men goodwill.

Oh, happy eve of day most sacred,
Of day most bless in noon or morn—
Of day that marks time's greatest era
When Christ the Prince of Peace was born.

A light to shine till every nation
On Christmas Eve the anthem sing,
And every language, race and people,
The bells of Merry Christmas ring.

Till Winter winds and Summer zephyrs,
In Northern wilds and Austral climes,
Shall bear in wide, concentric circles
Around the world the Christmas chimes.

Joe O'Hara's Christmas Eve.

By CORRY CAREW.

"AND so you're the new landlord, avic?" demanded the Widow Dempsey, the buxom proprietress of the "Brian Boroihmo" shebeen, which, as everybody knows, is five miles the Galway side of Oughterard and the snuggest shebeen in Connemara—of a dapper little gentleman, attired in a homespun ulster, to whom she extended a glass of potteen to keep "betune his shimmy an the cowld."

The gentleman had just arrived from Galway by the "lobster car," that elongated jaunting-car that plies between Westport and Galway, thanks to the enterprise and eclat of the late Mr. Bianconi, and his impedimenta, consisting of half a dozen portmanteaus, a gun-case, a set of fishing-rods and a bundle of canes, littered the floor, and even incumbered the solitary mahogany table and the three horsehair covered chairs of which the parlor of the Brian Boroihmo so proudly boasted.

"An' so you're the new landlord?" repeated Mrs. Dempsey, eying the ulster-enveloped little gentleman sidewise, much as a magpie would ogle an empty marrowbone.

"I'm the new landlord," replied the diminutive gentleman, drawing himself up to his full height.

"See that now!" observed the landlady. "Faix, an' it's cruel disapp'inted the boys'll be."

"Why so, madam?" demanded the little gentleman.

"Begorra, thin, yer that small they might as well be shootin' at a jackanipe."

Now, whether it was the comical look in the face of the widow or the effects of the potcen, or a combination the outcome of both, it has not been exactly determined, but certain it is that the little gentleman burst into as loud and as honest a laugh as ever came out of the mouth of a man—ay, even twice his size.

"That's a good chance for me," he joyously cried.

"Shure enough, sir," respondel Mrs. Dempsey, respectfully, for bravery is ever respected in Ireland, and the jovial way that Mr. Joseph O'Hara—for that is his name—took this somewhat startling announcement instantly placed him high on the pedestal of the widow's favor.

And let me tell you that Mrs. Dempsey was a person of considerable consequence in Ballymavourneen. She was known to be "snug," and to be on the best possible terms with the manager of the Hibernian Bank at Oughterard. She was the possessor of two cows, a score of pigs, and her praties-patch was the largest in the barony.

In addition to all this, she had a "lase" of fifty acres at Knockcroghery, and when the bog and the boulders were taken out of it the "bit o' land" was worth a clear £5 per acre, while Mrs. Dempsey paid but thirty shillings. She owned two horses and a colt, and a couple of jaunting cars, one for every-day work about the country, the other for hire and for conveying her across the bog on Sunday to Mass at Ballybrierly, where Father Tom O'Mulligan once in every week "wolloped the divil."

Now Mr. Joseph O'Hara was the owner, in fee, of a small property adjoining Ballymavourneen, having been bequeathed the same by his uncle, a very thrifty little attorney, who practiced in the Recorder's Court, in Green Street, Dublin, and who took the estate from a needy Western gentleman, to whom he had advanced a few hundred pounds at an interest ranging from one hundred and fifty to two hundred per cent. on every renewal of the straps or bills.

To do Joe O'Hara justice, he was as generous, as plucky, and as jovial a little fellow as ever trod in shoe leather, and, although he was told that by carrying favor with his uncle in the time to come all the old man's wealth would be his, he indignantly spurned the idea of squinning towards dead men's shoes, and made his own small way in the grocery business in St. Andrew Street, Dublin; and if he had been less fond of hunting, shooting and fishing, and more attached to sugar and figs and raisins, he would have been on the high road to a seat in the Town Council, and perhaps to a J. P.-ship.

"Arrah, thin, what brings ye down here on Christmas Eve, of all days in the year, sir?" asked the widow, as she dusted one of the horsehair-covered chairs with her apron. "I suppose ye're goin' over to Misther Joyce's, of Killeshandra? I hear there's to be heaps of divarshin beyant?"

"Faith, I wish I was, ma'am," replied Joe, with a light laugh, "but I've given up going to places that I'm not invited to. I'm only a small grocers in Dublin, and my heart never aches because I am only a small grocer."

"Ye'll not be afther thinkin' of stoppin' at Derrylossary?" this being the name of the O'Hara property.

"That's where I'm going, ma'am."

"Musha, shure, the 'ould house is fallin to pieces sir, an' it's that damp that the rats has the newmalgy and the mice is goin' about on crutches. In airnest, sir, shure yer not thinkin' of goin' there?"

"I have come down from Dublin for that express purpose. The fact is," added Joe, who was glad to open his heart to the widow, "the only invitation for Christmas I cared to accept I didn't get. I'm a bachelor, ma'am," with a facetious wink. "My landlady—I live in lodging in North Great George's Street—was anxious to spend her Christmas, of all places in the world, on the Hill of Howth; the servant wanted to spend hers on the Bog of Allen; so, as the Yankees say, I resolved to clear out, and here I am. A young man that does business for me stuck to the shop. I'll want another drop of that potsen and a car to take me and my traps over to Derrylossary."

"Here's the sperits, anyway, and I'll see that Murty Finn ketches the horse; but if ye'll be sed be me, yer honor, ye'll stop where ye are. Don't think, Misther O'Hara," added the widow, growing as red as a peony, "that I want for to make money out av ye, for, glory be to God, I never axed a halfpenny from any lone crayture that had for to spind Christmas in this house, nor me poor husband, Peter Dempsey, that's dead an' goin' these six years—may the heavens be his bed this night, amin!"—lavin' me a nurnser at thirty-wun—"God be good to him." And his widow reverently raised her eyes to the smoke-embrowned ceiling, which was gayly festooned with hams, hanks of onions, pigs' cheeks and flitches of bacon.

"Mrs. Dempsey," said O'Hara, "I'm deeply grateful to you for your hospitable intentions, and I tell you that I won't leave the country without spending a night under this roof as your guest, but I'm resolved upon putting up at Derrylossary; it's a sort of notion I have, and when I take a thing into my head it's hard to drive it out. So tell Murty to catch the horse, and if you'll be good enough to step as far as the door and show me the road, I'll walk on and the luggage can follow."

The widow, after some further argumentation, slipped from behind the battened bar and to the door, as requested. "That's the road straight forninst ye, sir; ye'll folly it till ye come to the crossroads, an' take the won that ladies be the bog. Ye could take a short cut over the bog, but, bein' a stranger, ye couldn't humor the bog, so it's safer for ye for to skirt it. Ye'll come to a boreen——"

"What's that, Mrs. Dempsey?"

"A boreen is a little road or lane, sir, and take the boreen right up to yer own gate. There's no gate but a pair of stone pillars, wid road stones on the top, like marks—whitewashed. The house is in the elm-threes, hid from the road."

Joe O'Hara thanked her, and was for moving off, when she recalled him.

"Does Dinny Blake know yer comin', sir?"

"You mean the caretaker?"

"Yes, sir."

"I wrote to him."

"Dinny is a hard man, Misther O'Hara, and no one in the country has a good word for him. Don't thrust him farther nor ye could throw a bull be the tail. He was ould O'Hara's own pet, an' the boys would have sent him below long ago if it wasn't for Father Tom."

"I'm sorry to get this account of him, ma'am," said O'Hara, "especially as he has the half-year's rent in the heel of his fist; but I believe every man to be honest until I find him to be a rogue."

Joe once more thanking the widow for her hospitality and friendly counsel, took to the road, and as he disappeared in the distance, Mrs. Dempsey muttered, as she turned into the shebeen, "He's a nice man, and a nice-mannered man, and I hope he'll not let Dinny Blake put his comether on him. Wisha, but it's a quare notion goin' to an impty ould house, that's fallin to pieces, for to spind Christmas. Now for Murty an' the horse."

In due time the red-headed urchin, whose tattered raiment of what had once been corduroy, was beguiled from the bog, and the quadruped duly attached to the rickety jaunting-car through the medium of suggawns or hay-ropes.

"Be the mortial frost, ma'am," observed Murty, as he gazed admiringly at the pile of luggage, "he's got more boxes nor the lord!" referring to the Earl of Oughterard, a plain, quiet-going old gentleman, whose impedimenta usually consisted of a dressing-case, a single portmanteau and an umbrella.

The car, groaning under its unaccustomed load, had scarcely jingled from the door when two men hastily entered.

These men were attired in heavy frieze coats, patched here and there with broadcloth. They wore knee-breeches of corduroy, blue knitted stockings and brogues—the latter, by the quantity of brown clay clinging to them, announcing a tramp across the neighboring bog.

"Wasn't that the landlord?" demanded the taller of the two.

"Yis, Mick Donovan, it was," replied the widow, eying him earnestly.

"I sed so," observed the shorter man, who was none other than the Dinny Blake, against whom Mrs. Dempsey had warned O'Hara.

"We seen him beyant from Clash, Mrs Dempsey," said Dinny.

"Faix, thin, but yer takin' his visit mighty aisy. Do ye know he's gone over to the house?"

"Let him go. Gimme a glass av sperrits," was Dinny's rejoinder.

"I'm thinkin' yer not for stoppin' at Derrylossary, Dinny Blake," said the widow, as she filled a couple of noggins with whisky.

"Amn't I? Ho, ho! Eh, Mick?"

"If ye are, ye ought to be over beyant to welkim him."

"Arrah, for what? D'ye know what yer talkin' about, at all, at all? Welkim! It's a cowld ind av a welkim his ould thief av an uncle used for to give me whin I gothered the rints an' brought them to him, every fardin'. Welkim! Bedad, it's more kicks nor halfpence I got. Let the new welkim himself!" and the man grinned insolently.

"This is a rale dayscent man, anyhow," observed Mrs. Dempsey, "and as well-behaved; an' it's yer business, Dinny, for to make the place as snug for him as ever ye can."

"Divil a snug I'll make it for him."

"Mebbe, it's worse ye'll make it for him," laughed Mick Donovan.

"Ay, an' sooner nor he thinks."

The two men having ordered fresh noggins of whisky, retreated into the corner where the table stood and conversed in whispers.

Mrs. Dempsey pretended to take no notice of their movements, but, nevertheless, she was all eyes and ears.

"Thim two is up to sumthin' bad in regard to O'Hara. I'll go bail Dinny's at the back av Donovan, and it was Donovan that shot Misther Burke, of Gortnalough, as shure as I'm a livin' woman. Bedad, that's a gun undher Donovan's cotamore. If there's not bad work in the air this blessed and holy Christmas Eve, may I never see glory!"

The men kept ordering and drinking whisky till the fiery liquid commenced to tell upon them.

"It's nearly time for to be going," observed Donovan, as he glanced up at the clock that so merrily ticked in the corner in a very bower of holly and ivy decorations. "Is that clock right, Mrs. Dempsey?"

"It's aiqual to the wan at the post-office beyant at Oughterard. What are yees up to, boys?" Mrs. Dempsey asked this question in a free-and-easy tone and in the most ordinary way; but the two men almost reeled under the question. They glanced at one another, then at her; then Dinny Blake replied, as if the words were weighted with lead and difficult to drag upwards:

"Nothin'. I'm goin' on the spree. What are you goin' for to do, Mick?"

"I was thinkin' av goin' to confeshun, no less," grinned the other. "Is Father Tom in his box to-night, Mrs. Dempsey?"

"It wud be well for yez both—and, mind me words," said the widow, with considerable intensity, "if yez were goin' to confession this blessed and holy night, for it's many a long day sence yez hint a knee to the great God, an'——"

"Arrah, come along oud o' this!" cried Dinny, catching Donovan's arm, "it's wud the soupers ye ought to be, Mrs. Dempsey, over beyant at Clifden," and, lugging Donovan to the door, the two went out into the gray light, for night was preparing to spread her sable mantle over the earth, and already had the distant mountains become enshrouded, while the great bogs loomed up like gigantic black shadows.

"Oh, if I could only get a word with O'Hara, to warn him—to tell him that this black-hearted villain, Dinny, is bent on destroyin' him! Yes," and the widow paced up and down the little parlor a prey to the most violent agitation. "I saw blood!—Holy Mary, mother of God!—blood in their villainous eyes—murder! Yes, murder! They must be stopped! Which way have they gone?"

She rushed to the door—listened.

"Ay, I hear their voices! Shure enough, it's for Derrylossary they're bound! He'll be shot to-night! Mary Dempsey, that man's death will be on yer soul if ye don't try for to save him! Who cares if the place is gutted whin I come back—there's a life for to be saved! I know it, I feel it! Let thim burn the Brian Boroihmo, if they like. I must get to Derrylossary before the black-hearted murtherers! Of all nights in the year, there's not a soul for to remain here while I'm gone, and there's forty pounds worth of sperrits in—to the divule wud it! Here goes."

Hastily arraying herself in a blue frieze cloak, with its capacious hood so peculiar to Connemara, she blew out the two dipt candles that illuminated the shebeen and, turning the key in the door, thrust it into her pocket, and was speeding across the bog almost ere she realized the resolution so rapidly arrived at.

"It's more nor four miles," she muttered. "I'll do it in less than an hour! Anyhow, I'll be there afore thim."

The night was pitch-dark, and to any save a practiced foot the bog was a succession of perils. To Mrs. Dempsey every inch of the path had been known from infancy, and she sped along as though on the high road at bright noon-day.

"What light is that?" she asked herself, as a twinkle as of a falling star appeared in the gloomy sable. "What can it be? I'm afther passin' Teddy Mulvany's turf-clump, that's two mile from the house to a perch. Ah! I have it: it's in the police barracks, at Clohogue, and—oh! my God!"

In watching the light she missed her footing, and, with a great cry for help, went down, down into the clammy ooze of a beghole, an ohze that sucked with the horrible power of the maelstrom, or the devil-fish.

* * * * *

Joe O'Hara having lighted his meerschaum pipe, marched gayly along the road leading to Derrylossary.

"What a lot of stories I'll have for Alderman Finnigan," he thought, "of my Christmas in an old tumble-down house. Perhaps it's haunted. By Crickey! that would be a Christmas Eve. 'My Christmas Eve in a Haunted Room!' What a title for a magazine article. What a jolly old girl that Mrs. Dempsey is. Old! why she's not more nor forty. She doesn't think much of my steward. I suppose that's what he is. These country people are all down on one another, anyway. I suppose he'll have the hard word for Mrs. D. The thing is to listen to counsel on both sides and reserve decision. Still, from what she says about this fellow, I'm afraid I'm in the wrong box for my £150.

Following the directions given him, O'Hara struck the boreen.

"Now for the whitewashed pillars—ah! here they are—not much of an entrance to your ancestral seat, my Lord de O'Hara," he exclaimed, aloud; "but this is all the English misrule has left you. Your retainers are—but, ha! I hear a voice—it is from the clouds; the rocks baying a deep-mouthed welcome as I draw near home. Eh! my Lord Byron, wilt thou permit the paraphrase. "By the Dick," he added, "that rookery is something, anyhow. I wouldn't ask a better roof to sleep under, or a sweeter lullaby. There's something infernally respectable about a rookery. Aha! old boys, I take off me hat to you. I salute you—I love you like pie." Joe was in the highest spirits. The novelty, the freedom, the loneliness, the absurdity of the situation just suited his mood and as he traversed the elm-lined avenue, grass-grown and full of the music of the dead leaves, he could have shouted in the exuberance of his spirits.

"Now, this sort of thing would make any other fellow melancholy as Jacques—but I like it. I hope Dinny Blake has plenty of rashers and eggs ready to pop into the pan, and I have my own flask. I don't see any sign of light or life. I suppose the front of the house is at the back. Ha! ha!" He moved round through the rank grass which wetted him up to his knees, until he reached a small door. He tried the latch, which instantly yielded. Pushing the door open, he rapped loudly with his knuckles. Then he knocked at the panel, and then he shouted "Dinny Blake!" at the top of his voice.

"The fellow has gone to some crossroads or other to meet me, and has missed me. Luckily, I have my box of wax matches here; so, by your leave, Mister Dinny, I'll inspect my own premises."

He struck a match and entered a room on his left. The ceiling of this apartment had fallen in, and the boards of the room above it showed enormous gaps, while the flooring of the room into which he now passed had entirely disappeared.

"I'll be hanged if the scoundrel hasn't made firewood of the floor," cried O'Hara, half angrily. "A joke's a joke, but this is carrying a joke a little too far!"

He now turned to the right, lighting a fresh match.

"Pshaw! the room is converted into a potato store, and onions, too. Faugh! I suppose the old cove lives up-stairs." O'Hara groped along the passage, the plastering of the walls giving at every touch and falling to the floor with heavy thuds. When he had gone a little way, he struck a match.

"I'll be hanged if this isn't outrageous, the staircase pulled down," holding out the light and peering upwards into the darkness. "Gone for firewood!" He was still peering upwards when a sound, directly above, startled him.

"Good God! is that a face?" he muttered, half-aloud, and as he spoke the match burned out.

He quickly lit another, then half a dozen, so as to increase the illumination. This brighter light served but to render darkness visible.

"Hi! I say. Hi! above there! Hellos!"

No response.

"I'll swear on a pile of Bibles that I saw a woman's face, and a very white one." Then, raising his voice, "Will you be good enough to bring a light here? I am Mr. O'Hara, from Dublin, the owner of this confounded tumble-down old shanty!"

Again he had recourse to his match-box, and, passing the gaping stairway, he penetrated a large hall, the boards of which had also been ripped up. He entered a room on the right; it was empty and boardless. He tried a door on his left; it was locked.

"Aha! I've earthed the old fox at last," chuckled O'Hara, as, applying his heel to the lock, he kicked open the portal.

The new-lighted match showed him a large room, furnished with a bed, a table, a rickety sofa, a few crazy chairs, and an old brass-bound armoire. Espying a brass candlestick, with the remains of a candle in the socket, O'Hara leaped at it, and, having secured more substantial light, made a deliberate survey of the apartment. A pile of wood lay heaped against the wall in one corner, from which O'Hara selected two or three inviting-looking logs, which he flung on the embers of a fire not yet quite extinct. Then he rummaged the drawers of the armoire till he found a couple of candles.

"So far, so good!" he exclaimed. "Now for that white face!"

Taking the lighted candles with him, he again set forth on his explorations, and traversed several empty rooms, the flooring of which had all been removed. "I must see if there's a back staircase anywhere, for there are no visible means of reaching the upper story that I can make out."

With two candles sweating and covering him with foul smelling grease, he made a most careful examination of the premises, but the house proved to be of the pattern of most Irish country houses of its size, two-storied, with but a single stairway; the sitting-rooms being on the ground floor and the bedrooms on the upper.

"I suppose I must wait till daylight or till that boy Murty arrives," thought the grocer, as he returned to the one habitable room and proceeded to dry his boots at the now merrily blazing logs.

"Faugh! I wish I was out of this place. It chills me. It's uncanny. Yes, that Scot's word suits it exactly. I'll be hanged if I don't warm Mr. Dinny Blake's skin for him. The blackguard can't say he didn't get my letter, for here it is," picking it up off the chimney-piece. "Ay, and well thumbed too. I'll thumb him—ugh!" he shivered. "I'll remain outside till that boy comes. I feel as if I was in a vault."

Was that a face peering in at the window?

He leaped to his feet and rushed over—

"Darkness there and nothing more."

"I can easily understand, now, how fellows get their nerves off their hinges. It's a place like this that sets 'em all astray. By the Dick, my flask! I'll take a dose of Dutch courage."

He had just lifted the flask to his mouth when a shrill cry came borne on the rising breeze.

"A banshee!" exclaimed O'Hara. "Hut, tut, old fellow, this will never do! Take a drink! Who ever saw a ghost?—no one. As for ——"

Another cry rang out, followed by a succession of shouts.

"The boy Murty, by Jupiter Olympus—Lucknow is saved! I'll make the boy step here to-night in this room—ay, and this house, too. They say three make bad company. I'll try it and disprove the adage for once."

"Misther O'Hara, Misther O'Hara!" yelled Murty, even while he was yet a long way from the house.

"All right. Here I am!" cried the grocer, flinging up the window, or, rather, dinging it out, for it gave way with a terrific crash.

"Where are ye, sir?" Murty didn't relish the dark avenue under the elms.

"Here!"

"Cud ye give me a taste av a light, yer honor?"

O'Hara extended the candle from the window, and, perceiving that the grass grew almost on a level to the sill, leaped out.

"Och, murther! but I thought I'd never raich the place, yer honor," cried the boy. "The cold baste, here, wudn't pass Knocklofty, where Barney Reilly was murthered—God be good to him, this night!—for all the coaxin' and cotherguin' I cud give him, an' whin he did consint, he tuk the bit in his mouth an' run me into a ditch. I've all the packages safe, sir, barrin' the gun, for Dinny Blake tould me that he'd carry that himself, for yer honor, an' in coorse I gev it to him."

"Where is he?"

"I met him below at Brian Dooley's Gap, yer honor!"

"Is he coming on?"

"Faix, I suppose so, yer honor."

"Don't unload the car, Murty. Is there any sort of a shed about here that you could back it into for the night?"

"There's a sort av a shed for horses 'round th' other side av the house, but I cudn't lave the car, yer honor, for I'm for to dhrive Father Tom himself over for to say first Mass at Barnakilty at five o'clock, an' I daren't go for to disappint his rivirince."

"Faith, you'll disappoint him for once, Murty."

"I wudn't do it for a crock o' goold, sir. Arrah, what luck or grace cud I have av I disapp'int the holy man? Divil a sight o' purgathry I'd ever lay my two eyes on, let alone the holy heavens!"

O'Hara knew that to endeavor to keep the lad would be but a fruitless task, so he compounded with Murty by insisting upon his remaining at Derrylossary until the arrival of Dinny Blake.

Murty backed the car into the outhouse, and stalled the horse in the hallway. He then knelt down before the log fire, and removing his caubeen, used it as a bellows with such vigor that the wood immediately began to crackle and splutter, and the flames to leap up the chimney.

"What a beastly old rookery this is, Murty," observed O'Hara.

"Divil a worse billet in the barony, yer honor."

"Does Dinny Blake live here all the year round?"

The boy glanced fearfully about him ere he replied, in a low tone:

"They say so, yer honor."

"What sort of man is he?"

"I'd as lave ye'd not be afther axin' me, sir."

"Why so, Murty?"

"Well, bekase I was at me dhuty to-day below wud Father Tom O'Mulligan, at Togher, an' I daren't tell a lie,"

"Tell the truth, my boy."

"Well, thin, yer honor"—here Murty glanced around almost in terror, while his voice sank to a hoarse whisper—"he has the worst name that ever was."

O'Hara groaned. He bade a long adieu to his £150.

"Divil a harder man wud the poor people nor he is. He'd sell the bib off av a child's back, an' has put more people out on the roadside to die av cowld an' hunger nor any agent, barrin' Lord Corlingham's."

"Is he honest?"

"He's the divil's own nagur, anyhow," was the evasive reply.

O'Hara thought back a little, and knew that his uncle should have the rent by hook or crook. Perhaps the man was only acting under the instructions given him.

"Do you know did Blake go to meet me to-day, Murty?"

"He didn't go for to meet yer honor, for I seen him wid Mick Donovan—the man that shot Misther Val Burke of Gortnalough—an' the two was over the bog at Clash all the evenin', for I was gotherin' turf for the misthress, an' the both av thim passed me, an' for fear they'd give me throuble I dhropped down behind me kreel an' let thim go by, an' they wor talkin' about yer honor, for I heard yer name twice."

Every moment the conviction grew stronger in O'Hara's mind that his agent meant to play him false. He didn't much mind the loss of the money, for now he felt certain that one penny of it he would never see, but an indefinable sense of the truth flitted before him, and he heartily wished himself back at the Brian Boruihme, facing the widow, after a snug supper of rashers and eggs and a tumbler of scorching hot poteen punch—perhaps two.

"Murty," he cried, after a silence, "I'll go back with you. I'll be hanged if I'll stop in this old rat-trap of a place. I feel as if I was in my family vault! Get the old horse ready."

"More power, yer honor!" exclaimed the boy. "Faix, I'll rowl ye over to the Brian Boruihme while ye'd be axin' the lind av a sack, an'—merciful God!"—springing forward—"there—there's a face agin the windy. It was Mick Dono——"

The report of a gun!

A wild scream!

"I'm kilt, yer honor!" groaned the unfortunate lad, as he fell into O'Hara's arms, a bullet having entered his chest.

O'Hara flung himself upon the floor and dragged the senseless form of Murty under cover. Then he crept up to the window along the floor, and lay beneath it, his heart beating like a Nasmyth hammer, every nerve braced for the struggle for dear life. In a few seconds he heard a movement outside the window, as if some one was amongst the rank grass. Then came a breathing. Then a hand appeared right over where he crouched. Then a pause. Then part of a frieze coat edged cautiously in. Then the rim of a caubeen. Then the unshaven chin. Then the face and head—and then——

O'Hara leaped upwards and, like a flash, held Donovan in a grasp that, giant though the other was, he could not shake off.

The grocer was a small man, but riveted together by rivets of steel. His hands were enormous, out of all proportion with the remainder of his frame, and a series of bones held together by muscles, tough as whipcord. Joe O'Hara's grip was a terror, and, knowing this, he felt that he was a match for any man once he got his antagonist inside that grip.

He was now dealing with an assassin, red-handed, and he resolved upon strangling him. Donovan was a man of powerful strength, and feeling the terrible pressure of the hands upon his throat, saw that his neck was in a noose that pulled as tight as a hangman's knot.

The struggle was an awful one. Jerking O'Hara clean out of the window, he endeavored to get at the gun, but the grocer, by a dexterous kick, sent it out of his grasp, and he now essayed to plant O'Hara on the granite window-sill in order to break his back against it. O'Hara's deadly grasp grew tighter, as the other flung him about, and every attempt to get the little man under proved a failure.

Donovan now commenced to rain terrific blows upon O'Hara's head and face, which the latter vainly endeavored to dodge, but as the pressure of the grocer's fingers grew more tense, the blows became wild and out of range, and the villain made a choking effort to gasp the word "Mercy."

O'Hara never allowed the idea of possessing himself of the gun to leave his mind. Bestowing a final squeeze upon the assassin's throat, he flung him off, and leaping to where he knew the weapon lay in the grass, seized it, and, ere the other could so much as raise his arms to defend himself, down came the butt upon his bullet head, leveling him to the earth, where he lay senseless and stunned.

"This is a nice Christmas Eve's work," muttered Joe O'Hara, as he climbed in through the window to the aid of the wounded lad, Murty. "I'm pounded to a jelly, but I've settled the hash of my agent, anyhow." He kicked the logs with his foot, causing a bright and merry blaze, and taking out his flask, leant over the boy, as he poured the vivifying liquid through the bloodless lips and clinched teeth.

"He's not dead. The heart beats. He may not be so badly hit, after all. If I could yoke the car I'd drive him over to the widow's. My God, how sore I am! I hope nothing's broken except my agent's skull. I must look after that horse. Ha! the boy is not gone. Murty! Murty! That's a good lad. Never say die."

"I'm here, Misther O'Hara!" The lad opened his eyes, threw a few sharp glances around, shivered and looked up in O'Hara's face.

"I'm kilt, sir," he gasped, "I—I feel the bullet here," laying his hand on to the region of his heart. "Oh! if I cud only feel Father Tom be me side. Oh! if I cud only get the rites, Misther O'Hara, mebbe I wud die aisy!"

"Don't speak, Murty; I'm going to stanch the blood a little and to yoke the horse. Keep up your courage, man, and you'll be in the Brain Boruihme in no time."

The boy's eyes brightened.

"I'll not die till I get there, never fear, sir, an' take no heed to me groans, not if I bawl murdher."

O'Hara succeeded, by the aid of the bed-sheets, which he tore into strips, in wrapping a series of bandages around the lad's body, and, having administered another dose of brandy, went in quest of the horse. The quadruped was easily discovered, as was also the shed where the car was sheltered, and in a few minutes the vehicle was drawn up before the door.

"I'd better see how my agent is," muttered O'Hara. "I'd like to leave him safe for the constabulary."

Donovan was lying where he had fallen, and was breathing stentoriously.

"I'll manacle you, my fine fellow!" said the grocer, and, suiting the action to the word, he took some remaining strips of sheeting and bound the senseless assassin, hand and foot.

"Undo these knots if you can!" bestowing a final kick on the recumbent form. "I haven't been tying up tea and sugar all my life without knowing how to construct a pretty bewildering knot."

Murty, brave as a young lion, by the help of O'Hara, struggled to his feet and contrived to reach the car.

"Let the baste have her head, yer honor," he gasped. "She knows she's goin' home. Whin we come forninst Knocklofty, where Barry Reilly was murdhered—the Lord be marciful to him!—I'll tell ye, ye'll have for to humor the baste a bit there, anyway."

The old mare went out into the darkness at an amble and at a cautious pace that proved the truth of Murty's forecast. She did not, however, refuse to pass the heap of stones on the side of the road which marked the spot where Barry Reilly went down to his death, but on gaining the high road broke into a canter, which never ceased until she stopped of her own accord, opposite the Brian Boruihme.

"All in bed and asleep!" cried O'Hara. "I'll waken the widow while you'd say knife."

He commenced to pound away at the door, but there was no response, and it was only after ten minutes of shouting and knocking that he reluctantly gave over the attempt.

"Thry the back-doore, yer honor!—the kay is always left there for me. Av yer honor will gimme a hand aff a the car, I'll go bail I'll get in."

O'Hara helped the lad round to the back of the shebeen, and beneath the door was found the key. In a trice, having lighted a candle, he assisted Murty to bed.

"I never knew the misthress out o' the house so late as this afore. Och, shure, it's the midnight Mass she's gone to over beyant at Timolin. That's it!"

O'Hara instantly set out for the constabulary barracks, much against the inclination of the old mare, and having routed up the force, a sergeant and three privates, one of whom started four miles for the doctor, returned to the Brian Boruihme, where Murty's deposition was taken, after which the party, consisting of the sergeant, a private, and O'Hara, wended their way to Derrylossary.

"It's me opinion," said the sergeant, as they hurried along, "that Donovan was hired by Blake to pick you off, and Blake will be able to prove an alibi. Donovan is one of the most desperate characters on this side of the county, and ye must have the strength of tin min to have been able to take a fall out of him."

They found Donovan, who had come to his senses, in a kneeling position near the window.

"I'll tell all," he growled. "Yez needn't be hard on me. Sergeant Joyce, I shot the boy instead av the man, an' it was Dinny Blake that ped me for doin' the job—may hell-fire roast him!"

"Where can we find him?"

"I'll tell ye, thin, an' the only favor I'll ax is for to be brought face to face wid him. He's over beyant at Clash, at Jem Heffernan's shebeen."

Father Tom O'Mulligan had to cross the bog on foot to say his first Mass on Christmas morning, as neither Murty nor the car turned up. His reverence was provided with a lantern, and carried a stout blackthorn to probe any suspicious-looking ground. His Scotch terrier, Dandie, accompanied him.

The dog, who had been exhibiting signs of uneasiness for a few perches, now hung back, and commenced to bark with all his might.

"A stray sheep," thought the Father, as he urged Dandie to go forward.

As he reached the boghole into which the Widow Dempsey had fallen, the dog began to yowl, and stood quivering with terror at its edge.

The priest held the lantern over the hole.

"Mother of God!" he exclaimed, "It's a human being!—a woman!—Mrs. Dempsey!"

She had sunk almost up to the chin.

Father Tom didn't lose a second. By lying flat on his stomach he reached out to her until he caught her arm. Using his herculean strength—he was a son of gallant Tipperary, and stood six feet two in his shoes—he succeeded in dragging her towards the edge, and, having a good grip of her now, he commenced to roar for help in the faint hope of attracting the attention of some of the villagers en route to first Mass. It was a feeble hope, but in extremities no chance must be lost.

It so happened that the constabulary party, with their two prisoners—for Dinny Blake was arrested in Jim Heffernan's shebeen—were returning to the police barracks by the road, and the very first cry for help uttered by the priest was heard.

* * * * *

Murty did not die of his wounds. The ball was extracted by Doctor Valentine Burke, and the lad is now as strapping a young fellow as ever courted the girls at fair, pattern, or wake.

Dinny Blake and his confrère, Mick Donovan, were sentenced to prison for life. They are now engaged in the jail at Galway in picking oakum.

Poor Mrs. Dempsey!—Mrs. O'Hara, I mean!—after a severe fit of illness, brought on by the terrible experiences of that memorable Christmas Eve—became herself again, and having disposed of her interest in the Brian Boruihme, repaired to Derrylossary—rebuilt by its owner—in the capacity of Mrs. Joe O'Hara.

"Faith," observed Joe to me, as I sat at the fireside in the snug dining-room at Derrylossary, over a smoking tumbler of poteen punch, "faith, Corry, me boy! there's few fellows have a queerer story of Christmas Eve to tell than yours, truly."

And Joe O'Hara was right.

A FIFTEENTH CENTURY CHRISTMAS TOURNAMENT.

AMONG the many associations of feudal festivities and mediæval ceremonials which Christmas brings, the mind may properly revert to those splendid pageants of chivalry, yclept tournaments and jousts, which fire the romantic imagination even more, perhaps, than the "pride, pomp and circumstance" of actual war. And, if the reader would realize pictorially one of these magnificent displays of knightly prowess and courtesy, we are acquainted with no more adequate representation thereof than the fresco of which we give a two-page illustration. Moreover, this is an illustration of a historic occurrence, not of a mere fiction of poet or novelist. The fresco represents a tournament at Raab (on the river of the same name, in Hungary), held on Christmas Day, 1477, according to custom on similar occasions, in celebration of the marriage of King Mathias Corvin, or Corvinus, with his second wife, Beatrice of Aragon, daughter of the King of Sicily. More particularly, the painter depicts the moment when that doughty warrior—the frequent conqueror of the Turks, and afterwards the captor of Vienna—comes before his bride for the prize, after having vanquished the valiant, and, as we see by the wreath on his shivered spear, the previously-successful knight, Holutar of Bohemia—a country Corvin had been at war with for rebelling against his sovereignty.

The fresco relates, then, to a time when chivalry was in its heyday in Germany and the neighboring provinces, as well as all over Europe—a period contemporary with Froissart, and immediately preceding the glorious age of Maximilian. Here we have all the leading elements of that most stately ceremonial of chivalry, the tournament—so called, from the practice of the knights running par tour, or by turns, at the quintain. The lists have been prepared, galleries raised for the various orders of spectators, a superbly-decorated pavilion erected for the Queen-elect of Love and Beauty, the absolute arbitress of the awards (in this instance evidently the King's bride), together with her brilliant suite; the arms of the knights proposing to joust have been exposed and examined; and these "right worshipful" and preux chevaliers have sworn to obey the laws of the lists. In this case we may also understand that the Bohemian vassal has, by touching the King's shield with the reverse of his lance, dared his rightful sovereign to a combat of courtesy, not à outrance, for their spears are blunt, having the morne attached to them.

The time has approached for opening this high festival of "holy" chivalry. The spectators arrive, attired, from king to churl, in their gayest habiliments; the knights armed cap-à-pie in glittering damascened steel, and astride noble chargers of highest mettle, gorgeously housed and caparisoned, range themselves at the ends of the parade; then the marshal, or "speaker"—the important personage on our right in the engraving, holding the warder, which he throws down when the jousting is to cease, and leaning on the shield emblazoned with the arms of the instituter of the games—steps forth and orders the King-at-Arms and heralds to summon knights and esquires "To achievement! to achievement!" This office they perform, not forgetting in their zeal the cry for "Largesse!" Anon the attendant minstrels pour forth their wildest war-strains, and the shrill trumpets of the heralds pierce the tumultuous air with the flourish of onset. Suddenly all is still as death. Then from each extremity of the lists two gallant horsemen prick forward their impatient steeds; a moment more they are dashing in full career, with bowed head and lance in rest, straight at each other, horse-trappings, plumes, and fluttering ladies' favors streaming in the wind—"rushing together," as the old Arthurian romancers have it, "like two wild boars." Another instant they meet, they hurtle, a crash is heard and all is over. Like thunder following the bolt of heaven, a deafening shout is raised by the spectators. The knight has struck the king full on breast-plate or visor; but the lance has shivered against that firm-seated warrior, whilst the Bohemian, hit not less fairly, is unhorsed and hurled to the ground—the greatest dishonor which could befall a knight. With a touch of irony, the painter represents a jester as tending the discomfited champion, as well as his own squire, and another fool is seen catching the riderless horse. The victor, meanwhile, having reined in his charger, aided by his esquire, and unlaced and doffed his helmet, giving his lance to a page, approaches to receive the chief prize of the tournament.

The eminent painter from whom we derive this most effective representation, M. Alexander Wagner, is a native Hungarian, whose examples of fresco-manipulation at Munich have elicited the warmest praise of students in art. The original of the subject engraved is a large fresco in the Redoute, a conspicuous building at Pesth, erected for dancing.

A CHRISTMAS IDYL.

By Amanda M. Douglas.

CHAPTER I.—CHRISTMAS EVE.

THE streets were full of happy people when Paul Sherburne stepped out of the dingy office, where he had been closeted for the last three hours. It was dusk now, and the lamps were lighted; the stores were all aglow, and the streets seemed one brilliant mass of illumination. Windows glittered in tempting display, groups of young and old laughed and chatted, and hurried in and out, laden with budgets. There was a spicy smell of evergreens in the crisp air.

For it was Christmas-time, Christmas Eve, the carnival of love and good-will, the greater feast of "Peace on earth."

But Paul Sherburne had no part nor lot in the matter. The wind was keen and cold to him, the gay laughter jarred like sweet bells out of tune; there was no peace, no good-will. He felt so bitter, so crushed, so utterly despondent. Could he go home and tell them they were beggars, nay, worse—so much in debt that a whole lifetime of hard labor would barely suffice to free them. They had staked everything on the issue of this suit, so sure they had the right on their side, and instead, it was a shame second only to a crime, though they had not sinned in the matter. He thought of them in the pretty sitting-room, waiting dinner for him—his sweet, pale, invalid mother, his grave, fair sister, Cecilia, with her passion for music; arch, dainty Mabel, who flashed hither and thither with the grace of a humming-bird.

"How can I tell them this night of all nights?" he groans to himself. "There will never be a Merry Christmas for us again—never!"

Then he plunged down a darkened side street, not heeding whither. Oh, how cold! Does any one ever really freeze, he wonders, or starve in this Christian land? God help the very poor! Where will they be another year? Like letters of fire, all that evidence burns before his brain, and he goes on rapidly, fiercely, until suddenly the lights come about again, and he pauses a moment, half-dazed.

"Hello! Sherburne!" cries a gay young voice. "What is all this mad pursuit about? Why, you look like a ghost! Surely the suit has not gone against you?"

"Yes."

Sherburne's voice is hoarse and strained.

"Oh, there must be some flaw or mistake——"

"No, there is none. We have always believed ourselves right, Ilcent. I would not have sworn a false oath, or told a wrong story, for twice that money, but some one further back did not hesitate," and Paul's voice rings with intense bitterness. "Two hours ago I saw the real proof for the first time. No, I can't fight for a lie."

"Are you going home?"

"Shall I ever have the courage to go and tell them the truth?" and he gives a mirthless laugh. "Christmas Eve, too! What a horrible travesty!"

"See here, Sherburne, don't let this thing drive you out of your senses. Come with me," and he links his arm in that of his friend. "Miss Carvill plays Juliet to-night, and I have two tickets. Everybody goes wild over her, you know. Come, it is early, and we will have a quiet talk over this unfortunate business before the play begins."

Paul Sherburne is but half-persuaded, yet his friend leads him along, and when he is seated in the warm theatre, where the lights are burning low and the early comers straggling in noiselessly, he gives a great shiver of something like relief. Despair is staved off for a brief while.

"There may be some new evidence," begins Brent.

"No. My grandfather made a horrible mistake

—it it was that. Don't let us talk of it, Brent. Tell me of Miss Caryll. I shall have to give up these things in the future, for we will be left fearfully in debt."

"Miss Caryll, you know, is a sort of puzzle in the theatrical world. She believes in Mrs. Browning's star—'So high, so pure, and so apart, a woman's glory lies!' Nobody can get near her in private life. She comes and goes with her maid. You see her on the stage, and that is all the glimpse vouchsafed to mortals. But such acting—no, it isn't acting; it is real life. Everybody else goes into the Christmas plays just now, but she keeps her steady way like a queen. She is magnificent. There, that is all any one knows about her. I have reached the end of my knowledge soon."

"Young, of course," comments Sherburne, briefly.

"Oh, yes, and beautiful—real beauty, not mere stage tricks. I hope there will be a good house. She never was here before."

Sherbourne glances around. Yes, the house is filling up rapidly. The best people in the town, too, and here and there a nod is graciously bestowed upon him. It is for Paul Sherburne, the rising young artist, who has come of good blood for generations. What will they say when they know that his grandfather kept back a true will and substituted another—forged, maybe—that he might live in luxury, like a prince; and Paul feels now that he would rather never have known his grandfather. Good old blood, forsooth!

The overture begins. Ah! if Cecilia were only here! and then another pang sends Paul. Oh! how can they all drop out of this pleasant, cultured life—this ease and independence—and take up the hard side of poverty. They are not rich, these Sherburnes—their grandfather spent too much for that—but they are comfortable, refined and charming, their little world thinks. And to-night they must drop out of it for many years, at least. Paul cannot wait for pictures to be sold when they all depend upon him for bread. He sees himself perched at a high desk all the long day, all the pleasant Summer weather, until letters and figures run together, and eyes and brain are weary. Well, even that—it will be honest toil!

But he loses his desperate mood listening to the sweet old play of love and youth and death—such sweetness and such sadness, that it always touches the heart of the weary old world.

There is Juliet prattling to her nurse; there she is vowing to Romeo, and now she stands in her balcony, murmuring the sweetest good-night ever put into words. Paul listens and looks. What is there about Miss Caryll that seems to take him back to early youth? Some tone of the voice, some gesture, some glance of the eyes that are so dark and soft—where was it!—where was it?"

"Brent," he says, as the curtain falls, "I have surely seen Miss Caryll somewhere."

"In your dreams. She was educated abroad, and has been in this country barely a year—never in this town before. I saw her two months ago in New York, when all the lion-hunters went crazy over her, and she would listen to none of their golden tongues. No, you cannot have seen her."

Paul is not convinced. Nay, when she looks at him—surely, it is at him!—he fancies a gleam of kindred recognition lights up her eyes. Oh, that smile! Has he dreamed of her? Has he seen some one play Juliet who is so very like? What a puzzle!

"How long was she abroad?" he asks.

"She lived there with her father, a musical genius, I believe—an old Englishman. I suppose she is English."

"She looks more like an American woman," says Paul, in the same connse tone. "Alma Caryll—that is a stage name, of course."

Brent nods as the curtain rises.

It is all over—the sad, sad tragedy. People go out quietly, it is so real. Paul gropes a little, his eyes are full of tears, and a sense of something lost out of his life that is not money, not fame—a floating memory that eludes at every turn.

The streets are still crowded. The churches are alight, the last touches of green and holly berries being added. They pass one where the organ is pealing triumphantly, for Brent will not let him go until he is safe in the shelter of his home, the trouble has struck him so hard, he thinks. They say "Good-night" at last.

When Paul enters the house they all glance at his changed face, and the story is told without words. Cecilia stands up, straight and tall, fair as an Easter lily; but her face is firm, not a weak line in it.

"We have lost," she says. "I could bear the tidings better on some other night."

"Oh!" cries Mabel, with a quick pang.

They sit down before the sleepy grate-fire, and he tells them with a brave, albeit faltering voice, of the sin Grandfather Sherburne committed. Ah, they are glad now that their father—the strict, upright, honorable Ward Sherburne—is not here to feel the stain, to know the loss.

Over their tears and sorrow the Christmas bells ring out the midnight hour. Joyous peals, solemn peals, soft caroling chimes.

"Unto us a child is born."

Alma Caryll hears them as well. She made no pauses in the greenroom, but came home in a close coach with her maid. It is a silent ride, for neither like to try their voices amid the din of rattling wheels. There is a respectful greeting at the hotel, though they can scarcely see the lovely, muffled face, as she goes to her room with the air of a princess. Then throwing off her wraps, she consults Margery's face, which puzzles her somewhat.

"You heard no tidings of them?" she says, with a gasp.

"Oh! yes. The very same family. Mr. Paul Sherburne is an artist. The father is dead. There are two sisters, Cecilia and Mabel!"

"Celia and Belle," she murmured, softly. "And what about the lawsuit?"

"They are likely to lose it, I believe. Some new evidence came to hand, and Mr. Paul withdraws and gives up everything!"

"Margie, I saw him to-night, I am quite sure. He did not know me!—how could he?" and she laughs as she draws up her slender figure with pride. "He was puzzled; I saw that in his eyes, and I played for him—right to him, in truth—and he may guess. If I were not so weary, I should want to go this very night. And if they are in any sorrow or trouble, I will pay back their tender care a thousand-fold. They were so good to me; I can scarcely wait! A blessed Christmas morning it shall be for all of us! But what makes you so grave, Margie?" and the sweet, earnest eyes study the older and now troubled face.

"I!" and she flushes while her eyes droop. "He has been here?"

"He!" Alma Caryll gives a cry of despairing pain, and throws herself into the armchair, wringing her slender hands. "Oh, Margie! after all his promises!"

"I knew he would not keep them," the companion replies, bitterly. "You cannot trust him in anything!"

"Was he——"

Alma shudders over the word. It has a nameless horror for her, although she has seen many actors under the influence of liquor. But that any one whose blood ran in her veins should so debase himself as this man has, and then come to claim her—ah! that is horrible!

That is the sad secret of her life! She has known want and poverty and toil; she has been homeless and crept into the shelter of a friendly stoop to sleep; she has been a servant and heard sharp words; she has begged for a mouthful of bread when she was near to starving. After this came care and tenderness, appreciation and training, scope for the genius that was her birthright—her mother's gift to her. She does not like to linger over the hard phases, still she is not ashamed of them; but when this man, who has the lawful right to claim her as his child, comes to her with bleer eyes and maudlin speech, and begs for a little money, the very light and joy seems to go out of everything. The world might only smile over it with tolerant pity; she is the genius, the actress whom they adore; the drunken father is an accident of fate that she is not answerable for.

She goes over this reasoning often, and yet it does not satisfy her fine pride. Suppose she was in some one's drawing-room, a little queen of social life, and this man stood waiting at the threshold to beg money of her, as she came down the steps. No promise holds him, no money buys him, no pleading changes him. He begs and cries, and she—ah! she cannot but pity. Yet it is all of no use.

She breathes a long, dreary sigh. "Did you give him anything, Margie," she asks, in a hard, strained voice.

"Yes. He promised to go back to the city to-night, but what is his promise worth? Oh, my dear, dear child, listen to reason. The money you give him only makes him worse. Place him somewhere in partial confinement with a keeper. Support him and let him alone. Why should he blight all your young, sweet life?"

"Margery, I wonder how children feel who love their fathers? From the first moment he came to me I have loathed him and shrank from him with such a feeling of repulsion that—that—I have much ado to keep from hating him. I cannot judge rightly. Is it my own selfish pride, my fear of being shamed? Ought I to grudge him my money? I cannot tell what is right," and the fair head drooped wearily.

"If you would let me decide. Dear, you are such a very child," and the soft hands take the unresisting face in a clasp fond as that of a sister. No friend could have been truer or more tender than this quiet Margery, who worships her young mistress.

"Something must be done," and she chokes down a sob. "I meant to be so happy here in the quaint, old town, where—but oh, Margie, all my life has been sad. I wonder if it will ever be like that of other women? And yet they envy me, bright and happy women, who have homes and love, who are shielded from every care."

They were praising her in many a home, this Christmas Eve—they would have showered treasures and gifts at her feet if she would have allowed, and wondered to find her cold and distant, little dreaming of the burden she carried, shadowing the natural gayety of youth.

As she lies on her pillow, listening to the midnight bells that usher in Christmas, she thinks of some bygone childish days, when she was merry with Celia and Belle, and Paul was her champion—her true knight, even to the fateful moment when his father had surprised them in a forbidden enjoyment, and would have struck her, save that Paul took the blow. Did they remember? Would they be glad to see her, or would they fear she might bring contamination into their peaceful home? Misfortune might make them tenderer.

CHAPTER II.—CHRISTMAS MORN.

THE pretty little town was astir early with its holiday joy. Children ran wild with new sleds, blowing their horns, and greeting one another with merry wishes. The sun shone and the sky was clear. Out in suburbs or untraveled places the streets were still white with snow.

The Sherburnes had to look their sorrow bravely in the face. It had taken the pleasure out of their gifts, the joy out of their wishes. Everything, even to their very food, belonged to another. The taste was like ashes in their mouths.

They sit over the late breakfast, heavy-eyed and pale, and glance at each other questioningly. Cecilia wonders if she cannot find music pupils, or she might sing in a church, for Paul is not to do everything while she sits at home with folded hands. She wonders what the new home will be like—stripped of the pictures, the ornaments and the easy-chairs that have been here ever since she was born and long before. Her whole life seems to be wound about them. Can she live elsewhere?"

The streets are divided between sleighs and wagons, but now and then some merry bells dash past their windows, or a group of children go singing carols. Once Paul raises the sash and throws them a handful of money, then he remembers, with a flush, that it is scarcely his money. Now a coach halts and the driver opens the door. Two ladies alight.

"I don't know," says Celia, with quick tears in her eyes, "how I can welcome any friend to-day. We should be alone in our sorrow."

The tidy maid has opened the door and ushers the visitors in the drawing-room. The elder of the two enters; the other pauses in the hall.

"The family are all in there?"—with a slight, imperious wave of the hand.

"Yes," answers the maid in amaze, and the radiant being walks in upon them. There is a subtle perfume about the velvets and furs; there is a kind of dazzle as if the sun had suddenly illumined and glorified the room. And oh, the tender, appealing beauty of the fair young face, the soft, entreating, pathetic dark eyes that seem to question mutely from face to face, reading nothing but surprise.

"Then you do not know me? You have forgotten!" says the sad, sweet voice, with a struggle for bravery perceptible in it.

Mrs. Sherburne turns as if she were striving to remember if ever this vision crossed her path before. Paul, who has been leaning his elbow on the mantel, comes forward with a strange, awed face.

"You are Alma Caryll," he answers, his eyes fixed on her by some far-reaching spell. "I saw you last night but not for the first time, I am sure," and the radiance of joy crosses his face. "You are—Alice Calderon!"

Celia utters a cry of surprise.

"Not Alice!—our own sweet, pretty, lost Alice!"

Our own! How comforting the words sound. She half-kneels at Mrs. Sherburne's feet, and clasps the thin hands lying in her lap, but Paul is beside her and takes one of her own, so fair and soft, in his, in a wondering, incredulous way.

"This is what puzzled me so last night—this shadowy resemblance. I had a cloud of care and perplexity on my mind, or I must have remembered Alice!" Then he takes a step back and studies her face again. This is the wonderful actress who moved her audience at will, and yet about whom the world seems to know nothing!

"Yes," she answers, "I am Alice Calderon, whom you all befriended in her hour of need, whom——" and they all think of that last scene.

"Forgive Ada!" begs Mrs. Sherburne, with a tremulous voice. "Remember that his father's whims and follies made him severe in the extreme. And he has gone to his rest. He was honest and upright, and would not have swerved from the truth to save his own life."

"I forgave him long ago," and she smiled through tears. "After all, it sent me out into the world to try my strength and do my best. I have not shamed you, my best and dearest friends!" yet she gives a quick glance around.

"Shamed us!" cried Paul, with triumph in his tone. "You should have seen her last night, Celia!"

"But all these years?" says Mrs. Sherburne. "And where did you go?"

A wavering color flits about her face. She will not pain them by detailing the weeks of pain and want that came between.

"I persevered," she answers, with a smile. "I went to New York, and at last found some one who would listen to my wants. I went on the stage in children's parts, and then abroad with a variety troupe. In London, an old Englishman, who had been connected for years with the opera, took a fancy to me. He was not rich, but he adopted me and gave me a musical education, but decided, before that was finished, that acting rather than singing was my forte. He was so good, so proud of me, that I tried my best for his sake. Two years ago he died. Last March I returned to America with engagements on every hand. I did not know——" and she pauses.

"He was very sorry," explains Paul. "I think he softened at the last. But he has been dead five years."

"I could not come and sow dissension between you," and now she rises in her old imperious way. "A month ago I learned all that had happened to you. I made an engagement to come here Christmas Eve, and resolved to see you. I was quite sure, last night, you were Paul Sherburne," and she turned her lovely face to him.

"How strange!" exclaimed Celia. "Yet you always were an actress. And that night's work would have been amusing if its results had not proved so sad. Since the genius was given to you, why not use it?"

The one thing Mr. Sherburne had resolutely set his face against had been theatre-going. His father had half-ruined himself in the infatuation. Mrs. Sherburne, in the rounds of her tender charity, had one day found a deserted wife, a refined and accomplished woman, dying of consumption. Her child, the little Alice, was unusually beautiful, and after her sad bereavement Mrs. Sherburne brought her home. She would fain have adopted her, but Mr. Sherburne had a nervous objection to placing the little waif on an equality with his own children. So she remained for some months, until the ill-fated evening when she had arranged a little play for their amusement. Paul, Celia and herself were the actors. In the midst of it, to their great dismay, Mr. Sherburne entered.

Alice had the small stage to herself at that moment, and valiantly took the blame upon her own shoulders; but Mr. Sherburne went into a towering rage and would have struck the little girl but for Paul's interference, although he declared she should not stay in the house another hour. Alice took him at his word and disappeared that very evening. All Mrs. Sherburne's efforts to find her proved unavailing, though she would not have dared to bring her back in the home circle. Kind and indulgent in most other matters, he was rigid in this. His children should not be corrupted by a stray waif.

"Yes, I had the genius," Alma Caryll utters, proudly. "I think some old playacting blood runs in my veins. I meant that night, child as I was, to achieve a success, and come back to you pure proud woman, and I have done it. Margery there, in the other room, can tell you. She has been mother, sister, friend."

Mrs. Sherburne rises and kisses the fair brow. "My child," she says, with a great tremble in her voice, "my dear, lost child! You are a Christmas gift to us just when a bitter misfortune overshadowed us. Thank God for this!"

Cecilia and Mabel hang about her. Deft hands disrobe her of her wrappings and seat her in a cozy armchair. She is theirs now, for a few hours at least. The great world cannot claim her between, and if these hours are fleet they shall be golden. They do not even want to talk about the loss, but she will, and the fond sympathizing heart is pained at their ruin, and yet—now she can reward them for that old time love, that goodness to her mother. She can read the fine delicate pride in each face, and she will do nothing to wound it, but this mother shall be here, these sisters dear to her as if they were her very kin; then she pauses suddenly in her dreams of the future, and her face is scarlet with some new emotion that is not shame nor fear; but Paul's eyes are fixed upon hers with such a strange steady gaze, that every pulse starts and trembles.

"Oh, there is something else," begins Mrs. Sherburne. "Paul, you remember Mr. Calderon? It will be sad for you to know, my dear, but your father came to us——"

"Oh, not here!" she cries, her face paling suddenly, and the small hands clasped in pain. "Not here—surely not to you!" Is this one blot on her life, the thing she can neither help nor hinder, to confront her everywhere?

"My dear, yes. He came to trace your mother. He was truly repentant, I think. You see, he had a fancy for inventions and discoveries, and scarcely thought how she and her little child were to get bread. One day, when he seemed on the very eve of success, he took the last of her jewels, just as they were in the case, and pawned them. Her patience had been tried to the bitter end, and the next day she packed the few clothes that remained, and with her daughter went to do for herself. He scarcely missed her then, but years after, when he came to have a little success, he traced her hither, and learned that she was dead. Then he made an effort to find you, but his health was so shattered that he came back to die, for he wanted to be buried beside your mother. My dear, try to forgive him! He was a curious, learned person, with such hoards of knowledge stored away in his brain, and but few practical ideas among them. His was a sad, wasted life; but I thought you would like to know that they lie together in an old-fashioned churchyard, just outside the city, where my own mother's people are buried."

"Dead!" Alma says, in a hushed, awesome voice. "Dead! my own father! You are quite sure? There could be no mistake?"

Her breath comes in great gasps, and her eyes have in them a piteous appeal. If this is truly her father, who then is the other that had made her life a burden?

"My dear," pleads the soft voice, "do not look so frightened. It was your father, surely. He brought back your mother's jewels, all that he was able to redeem—her marriage-certificate and many other papers. There was a false bottom to the jewel-case which contained them, though he did not know it at the time. Paul, will you go to my desk and find that faded purple case?"

"He died," Alma goes on saying, in a dazed, absent way. "Was there no one else? Did he have a brother?"

"I do not know. There was a person came here, let me see, over a year ago, to make some inquiries. But he had a curious, furtive expression, an unpleasant look, and I had promised never to give this case into any hands but yours."

"How good you have been to me and mine," Alma says, deeply moved.

Paul returns with the case. It is much faded and the silver platings sadly tarnished. Alice Calderon is engraved on the top. Its rightful owner opens it and pours its contents in her lap. A necklace and cross, some rings and ear-pendants and an old-fashioned bracelet. How quaint and simple they look to her! What would her mother say to her brilliant collection?

The little spring is touched and the papers taken out. Old and yellow, with a curious, musty smell. Marriage-certificates, birth and death registers, love letters. She glances them over with an awesome feeling, as if she was touching dead fingers.

"Oh, see here!" she exclaims, presently, more startled than she cares to show. "Here is the name of Sherburne—Mark Sherburne—married to Anabella Ross. And my mother's name was Ross."

She glances up as if she expects them to explain it. Nor is she mistaken. Paul catches the paper in his hands.

"Mark Sherburne!" and his voice is clearly, strongly triumphant. "Mother, Celia, our case hinges on this man. He may, perhaps, have deeded or sold his rights to our grandfather, but if he left heirs, they are the first claimants of the estate. He went off in his youth and no one knew whether he married or not; there is no record. Perhaps grandfather was right, after all. There might have been no will to suppress. Let me see them all!"

He tumbles them over with eager, trembling fingers. Mark Sherburne marries an Englishwoman in one of his journeys abroad. His daughter, Miss Sherburne, marries her cousin, Alden Rose, and their child is mother of Alice. So the little orphan taken to their home and heart is of their own kin. They have right to claim her, this stately, beautiful, famous Alma Caryll. And if the lawsuit goes against them they will not care, they all insist, since she will be the gainer by it.

Alma laughs. Why, this morning she thought she could never be light-hearted, and now she might dance for very joy. She, who had to take her Christmas greeting from admiring strangers, now has loving friends and relatives of her own. For this mother shall be hers in deed and truth. Does Paul think so, watching the beautiful eyes?

"Margery," she cries presently, and brings in her faithful friend, who must hear the wonderful story over again. And now she is delivered from this strange impostor who someway had discovered her identity and traded upon it. She even forgives him, and Paul promises to settle with him to-morrow. She will never look for a champion again.

The church bells stopped ringing long ago. There were carols and anthems and sermons, and grand Christmas dinners. The joyous sun has been high up in the clear heaven and is going down, but nowhere can be find happier hearts, though their Christmas dinner has been well nigh forgotten.

That evening the theatre is full again and Alma Cuyil plays Juliet with such grace and fervor that her audience is entranced. Celia looks and listens, Belle is drowned in tears, but Paul dreams of another Rosco and another ending. He is there at the door when she comes out in her wraps, and draws the fair hand through his arm.

"Merry Christmas," he says, softly. "Has any one wished you that this whole day?"

"They have done still better," and there are tears and smiles in her face. "They have brought it to me!"

ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

By Etta W. Pierce.

IN a deep bay window, hung with crimson silk, two persons, a man and a woman, stood gazing silently out into the gathering December night.

Behind them stretched a long drawing-room lighted by an open fire—a genuine yule-log—that spread its warmth and cheer from a hearth of Dutch tiles, and shone with rich Rembrandt effect on the silken damask and brass-work, the old bronze and china, the beveled glass and stiff family portraits of the handsome apartment. Holly wreaths brightened the dark walls, and Sèvres vases, full of Christmas roses, ornamented the high mantel.

Outside the window glimmered a frozen avenue, overhung with creaking branches, a stone balustrade fringed with icicles and a desolate lawn, where a fountain wrapped in straw stood like a melancholy ghost.

Darkness was rapidly falling. The busy seaside town beyond the gates of Holmwood twinkled with lights. The fishermen's windows up and down the bleak beach shone cheerfully in the bitter gloom. Overhead was a sombre sky, full of storm. The wind blew straight from the North in searching, pitiless gusts, and up from the rocky shore, the great sea invisible in the gathering twilight, sent up a sullen wintry roar.

"Carol, carol, Christians, Christmas comes again," hummed Marcia Tudor, with her rieuse face pressed to the frosty plate glass of the window, "Look, Nigel! There's a great flake whirling down. To-morrow will be a white Christmas."

She was a little sparkling brunette, arrayed in silk and velvet that seemed far too grand and heavy for her petite figure, and with diamonds blazing on her tiny hands and in her ears, and at her soft brown throat. She turned as she spoke, and lifted her eyes to the face of the man beside her—the man whose wife she was to be on the morrow. He gave a nervous start, as if waking from sleep.

"Eh? I beg your pardon. A white Christmas? By Jove! I should call it a black one. The house is infernally like a tomb to-night!"

And yet the two could distinctly hear music and merriment in distant rooms, doors opening and closing, footsteps and pleasant voices. Miss Tudor opened wide her black eyes.

"I fear you are out of spirits," she said, dryly. "At dinner you were sadly distrait, and you had no appetite—your mother noticed it."

"My mother is an uncomfortably sharp woman," answered Nigel Kave, bitterly.

He stood in the shadow of the crimson curtain, his dark eyes cast sullenly down, his lips set in a hard line. He was barely two and twenty, tall, handsome, with a high-bred, insouciant face, marred now by a miserable, moody look. Plainly this bridegroom-elect was not transported with his approaching happiness.

Miss Tudor drummed on the pane, and sang another snatch of Christmas song:

"Night hung on the hill-top,
Stars shone in the sky
When the Prince of Salvation
Came down from on high,
No room in the inn
For his heavenly head,
So in Bethlehem's manger
They made him a bed."

"Nigel," she said, shyly, "I hope the storm will pass with the night. I would like the sun to shine on our wedding-day—it's an omen of good, you know."

His wedding-day! Something like a shudder went over his stalwart young figure.

"I don't believe in omens," he answered, brusquely; "let us draw the curtain, and shut out this cursed night."

The little heiress stared hard at her morose lover.

"How strange you are, Nigel—how bearish! It is absurd to ask it; of course, but—are you sure that you are quite happy?"

A little thrill of distress had crept into her voice.

"Happy!" he echoed, with a short, mirthless laugh. "By Jove! yes, madly, outrageously happy! It's the duty of every bridegroom to be that, is it not?"

She put up one pretty hand and smoothed his gloomy face.

"I do not wish to doubt your word, but, of late, Nigel, I have sometimes fancied——"

He hastily seized her hand, thereby cutting the sentence short.

"Where is your ring, Marcia?"

The slender finger on which the big Kave diamond had blazed for two happy months was now bare. She saw her loss and grew pale.

"Oh, it was always too large!" she gasped. "Help me to look for it, Nigel. I am sure this means misfortune!"

"Nonsense! Don't be superstitious!" he answered, but he knelt on the rich carpet, and searched with her for the missing jewel. They examined every corner, poked under the claw-footed chairs and the Venetian cabinets, but found no diamond. Kave was the first to scramble to his feet.

"You are spoiling your smart gown, Marcia," he said, dryly. "Let the ring go. By-the-way, here is another." He drew a tiny case from his pocket, opened it, and disclosed a hoop of plain gold. "You will wear this to-morrow—why not put it on now in place of the other?"

She colored and shook her head.

"No—oh no! That would be in bad form, as the English say. Probably I have dropped my diamond in my dressing-room or at the table. If you do not mind, I will go and see."

He did not mind in the least. He listened till the last echo of her departing feet had died away, then he turned from the deep window, from the warm firelight, and, stepping into a wainscoted hall, put on hat and overcoat and walked straight out of the house.

He had a summons to answer on this stormy Christmas Eve, a tryst to keep, of which that fond little brunette, Miss Tudor, knew nothing, and the hour for it had already struck.

With his hat drawn low over his eyes, he hurried down a drive, where white flakes were flying, and dead boughs rattling, like the dry bones of Ezekiel's vision, and through an open gate passed into the highroad.

"What the deuce can I say to her?" That was the perplexing burden of his thought. Along the entire length of a lighted street he went, looking not to the right hand nor to the left, until, at last, he found himself on a strip of lonesome beach, at the base of a barren hill.

It was a bleak and desolate spot—uncanny, as the Scotch say, at all times, but doubly so on this eerie night. Kave turned into a narrow path, and ascended the hill, till he reached a large stone, with the remains of an iron staple in it—part of an old gibbet. Here, long ago, two sailors had been hung for the murder of a messmate. The people of Whitehaven carefully avoided the place after nightfall, for it was said the defunct mariners had an unpleasant habit of visiting the scene of their former suffering. Kave looked around as if expecting to see them now; but nothing human or superhuman was in sight. He lighted a match and drew out his watch.

"It is past the hour," he muttered, "Where the mischief can she be?"

He seated himself on the old gibbet stone, and began to beat an impatient tattoo with his heels on the frozen earth. The snow fell softly. There was a moon behind the clouds, and a weird dull half-light lay over the barren hill, up which the angry roar of the sea boomed at intervals. Kave waited.

Presently he heard a flying step, a panting breath, and a girl, wrapped in a tattered red shawl, rushed up the narrow path, and stopped suddenly before him. He arose with a thrill which was half of relief and half of fear—absolute fear.

"Hallo!" stammered Kave, "you are late, Polly?"

The red shawl fell back from a wild, tragic face, white as death, in spite of her breathless run, and lighted by a pair of splendid gray eyes, as fierce and bright as a hawk's. Over her shoulders streamed a great mass of hair, half out of braid—silky, lustrous locks, of the darkest shade of gold. She might have been sixteen—certainly not older. Her dress was coarse and shabby; she had a neglected, untamed air, a defiant, threatening manner, but about her exceeding beauty there could be no question.

"Dad is sick," she said, standing as motionless and stern as the gibbet-stone itself. "I couldn't come sooner. So you got the message I sent you?"

"Yes," he answered, in an aggrieved tone. "It's an uncommon bad night for a meeting on this hill, Polly! Well, out with it!" Bracing himself stoutly: "What do you wish to say to me? I hope old Jack is not bad. Can I do anything for him? Perhaps you would like to buy him a Christmas gift—— By Jove! I quite forgot—I ought to have brought you something of the sort myself——"

He stopped, for her superb eyes had become like bale-fires in her colorless face. She clinched her hands convulsively in her scarlet shawl.

"No!" she answered, mad excitement and stern repression struggling in her voice, "you can do nothing for dad—he wants none of your Christmas gifts—no more do I. What's Christmas to him or to me? I sent for you to come here to-night, because I must know the meaning of some things I've heard talked about lately among the fishing-folks."

"What things?" faltered Kave.

Her breath came thick and short.

"Long ago you told me your mother wanted you to marry a rich heiress—some ward of her own—a Miss Tudor—do you remember? I hear she's stopping at Holmwood. I saw you riding with her yesterday—a dark girl, dressed like a queen." She laughed bitterly. "You've not been at the shanty for two weeks. Old English Jack's daughter, with her rags and tatters, begins to weary you. I might have known months ago how that would be. But there's another thing I've heard. Holmwood is full of guests and grand preparations. The gossips say—but no!" striking her breast wildly; "I can't tell you—it's too much!"

His high, handsome head drooped a little. He dug his heel sullkily into the fresh-fallen snow. Never before, in all his easy, careless days, had Nigel Kave felt such a pang of guilt and remorse as assailed him at this moment.

"Better make a clean breast of it, Polly!"

She laid her cold, brown hand upon his arm.

"Well, then," she said, slowly, "to-morrow, the White Raven folks say, you are going to marry your mother's ward, Miss Tudor!"

No answer.

The wind tore across dreary Gibbet Hill; a ghostly gleam of moonlight shot from the clouds and fell on the tense, white face of the girl, on the shamed, downcast one of the man. His utter silence thrilled her with horror and amaze.

"Why do you not speak?" she demanded. "Only the guilty keep still when they are accused. Great God! Nigel Kave, it cannot be true?"

Concealment was no longer possible. As well have this matter out with her now as at some later day. He made a weak attempt to defend himself.

"You see, my mother would give me no peace, Polly. By Jove! you don't know what it is to have a woman nagging you late and early, and threatening to cut you off with a shilling. I've more than once explained to you how my father left his fortune entirely to her, thereby making me the slave of all her caprices. Under such circumstances, could I do otherwise than keep my passion for you a secret? I am a weak coward, a contemptible scoundrel! You cannot despise me more than I despise myself."

She shook with sudden terror.

"Is it true, Nigel?" she urged, wildly—"is it true?"

"It is true!" he answered, recklessly. "I may as well own it. To-morrow morning, at ten sharp, I shall marry Miss Tudor."

She stood as if changing to stone. Her white, beautiful face, in the shadow of its wind-tossed hair, assumed an utterly dazed, stunned look.

"You? Am I going mad, Nigel?" she said, hoarsely. "Can a man have two wives? Are you not married already, and to me?"

His tawny young face, usually so cool and careless, had grown as pale as her own.

"For heaven's sake, don't make a scene, Polly! I'm awfully sorry, but there was a mistake. I ought to have told you before, but I couldn't. No, I am not married to you!"

She staggered as if she had received a blow.

"What do you mean?"

"Polly, Polly! don't look like that! Be reasonable. It's a cursed scrape. You remember the night, three months or more ago, when you consented to a secret marriage, and I rowed you by moonlight to Haggett's Beach, where the camp-meeting was? You remember the traveling preacher I found there—the man who made us one?"

"Yes!" she breathed, rather than spoke. "Go on!"

"Well, shortly after, I chanced to hear that the fellow had no right to marry anybody, that he was an impostor—no preacher at all, in fact—and so my union with you cannot be legal; that goes without saying. When I made the miserable discovery, Polly, I promised my mother that I would marry Miss Tudor."

He dared not look at her. He was not bad or heartless by nature, and his passion for this handsome girl was by no means dead.

"If I am not your wife," said Polly Lawless, in a strange voice, "what am I?"

Penitent, remorseful, he flung himself at her feet.

"Polly, as heaven is my witness, I love you with my whole soul! I would marry you over again this very hour were it not for my mother. But she has set her heart upon Miss Tudor, and hurried forward our marriage with pitiless haste. Should I cross her wishes now, she would cut off my allowance and disown me. What can I do? I am the most miserable dog in existence. I have known no peace since Marcia—confound her!—came to Holmwood. Is it possible for me to make you any reparation, my poor child? I'll settle upon you half of my earthly possessions—I'll buy old Jack a schooner—I'll——"

"Stop!" Her dilated eyes had grown black and terrible, her soft lips were set like iron. Standing over him there in the falling Christmas snow, in the dreary, windy night, she had a dangerous look, like that of some wild creature at bay. "Stop! let me understand you fully. You are ready to thrust me out of your way—you will marry that woman to-morrow, and leave me to my fate?"

"I must, Polly! It is not a matter of choice, but of necessity. My word is given—everything is arranged. Moreover, I need money—I have debts, and they must be paid. My mother will do the handsome thing by me when I gratify her darling wish. Polly, Polly! do not I tell you that I will make any reparation in the power of man——"

A wild laugh broke from her livid lips.

"Coward! traitor! I wish you joy! A merry Christmas to you and to your bride, Nigel Kave! The reparation that I ask for and that I will have is—this!"

He was still kneeling at her feet, his handsome young face upturned in the gray light. With a swift movement she flung back her tattered red shawl. There was a gleam of something steely and bright, a flash, one startling report, followed by another and another, and Nigel Kave uttered a cry, and, like a log, fell straight back against the old gibbet-stone.

She stood for a moment, petrified with horror at her own deed. Then she bent over the prostrate man. His face was hidden in the snow. She raised it quickly—it was livid and set; the half-open eyes shone under the sinking lids in a horrible, ghastly way.

He did not stir, he did not breathe. She put her hand to his heart. Something oozing there, warm and wet, made her start back.

"Great God, I have killed him!" gasped Polly Lawless.

And, snatching up the still smoking revolver, she turned and fled.

At the foot of the hill she met two men—fishing folks, as she knew by their rough dress and loud, hearty voices. She ran up to them.

"There's a man lying dead by the old gibbet!" she cried, and then went on.

The sea was roaring madly along the shingle. She turned a bend in the rocky, irregular shore, and stopped before a low, black, solitary fishing-shanty.

The door was unlocked. She opened it, and stepped into a room lighted by a driftwood fire and one oil-lamp, which smoked and flared on a rude deal table. In one corner stood an old sea-chest, in another a bunk was built against the wall. A pea-jacket and sou'wester hung on a peg by the door. Across the narrow window, which rattled wildly in the gusts from sea, a coarse curtain was drawn. Dreary poverty reigned in this house. No Christmas cheer here—no merriment. English Jack, as he was called by his fellows, and this wild, golden-haired girl, never kept Christmas. She opened the sea-chest, and flung into it the revolver—old Jack's property, appropriated by her an hour before for the purpose of wreaking vengeance on her faithless lover. Then she went up to the bunk, whereon a motionless form was lying, and turned back the patchwork coverlid from the pinched and grizzled face.

A middle-aged man, wasted now by sickness, with iron-gray hair matted about his sunken temples, and his breath coming in gasps through his discolored lips. He was sleeping, just as she had left him. Polly seated herself at the foot of the bunk, and, clasping her hands about her knees, rocked back and forth in silent, sombre agony.

What had she done? Murdered the man whom she loved more than her own life—the man who had enticed her into a secret marriage, only to deceive and forsake her for another woman.

"I was no mate for him," she muttered. "He was born to riches and honor; but I—what am I?" She cast a bitter glance around the shanty. "I might have known his love for one like me could not last. He's dead! I have killed him! There'll be no wedding to-morrow—no Christmas merry-making. Miss Tudor will have to look for another husband. Mine she cannot have; thank heaven for that! Better that he should be dead than belong to her. They will hang me, no doubt, as they hung the sailors on Gibbet Hill. I don't care! I don't care!" Then she flung her arms suddenly over her head. "Oh, my darling! Oh, my darling!" she cried, bursting into a storm of the wildest sobs that ever shook a human frame.

Presently she stopped, and looked at her brown right hand. It was smeared with blood. She ran to a bucket of water, and hurriedly washed away the telltale stain. By this time they had carried him to Holmwood—to his lady-mother, to his promised bride. Probably the great house was now full of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. Maybe the officers of the law were already on the track of the slayer. She listened, but heard nothing save the angry sea without, and the hoarse breathing of the sick man within. Once she crept to the door, and peered forth in anxious terror, but only the white snow and the black water were visible.

Hour after hour went by. Still Polly sat by the rude bunk, waiting for she knew not what. English Jack had grown restless. His bony hands moved convulsively outside the coverlid; delirious mutterings escaped his lips.

"Cold falls the snow, the rough winds blow,
All in the Christmas morning.
There's wooing and suing and much undoing,
All in the Christmas morning."

Polly leaned over him.

"Are you awake, dad? Do you want anything?"

No, he was not awake; but he continued to groan and whisper. She listened.

"'Peace on earth, good-will to men.' Who said that? I care nothing for preaching parsons or their texts. Has she come yet? The word I sent ought to bring her from the ends of the earth. Hark! I hear the thrushes and starlings singing, and the blackthorn is all in flower. No, it's Christmas snow. I'll enter by the window. The child is there—asleep—under the holly and mistletoe."

Of what was he raving? She knew not; but it was plain his mind had gone back to his English home—that home of which he rarely or never spoke to her. The next moment he had fallen again into a stupor.

Unable longer to bear her own thoughts, Polly arose softly, snatched up her shawl, and ran out of the shanty. Up the beach she went, and into the town. Midnight was now at hand. The snow still fluttered down, the wind still blew. Whitehaven, for the most part, was asleep. Polly stumbled through the gathering drifts, turned into the open gate of Holmwood, and flew up the drive under the groaning trees.

Ah, the inmates of this house were not sleeping! Lights flashed hither and thither; the shadows of hurrying figures came and went across the windows. Like some haggard spectre, Polly sprang upon the terrace. The curtains of the drawing-room had not been drawn. Reckless of consequences, she flattened her white face against the frosty glass, and looked in.

The roaring fire still flashed merrily over all the rich dark splendor of bronze and velvet, buhl and mahogany, and showed her the Christmas roses in the vases and the holly wreaths on the wall. The room was vacant, but even as her eyes wandered over it a portière was lifted, and Marcia Tudor entered.

Her pretty brunette face had lost all its color and sparkle. Her eyes were swollen and red, as if from violent weeping. She began to walk back and forth across the rich carpet, wringing her jeweled hands, and sobbing under her breath. The window was fast. Polly could not open it; but unable to contain herself at last, she rapped loudly on the pane.

"Is he dead?" she cried. "Is he dead?"

Miss Tudor turned, saw that white face in its setting of flying hair and tattered shawl, and uttered a shriek of terror.

The sound brought Polly to her senses. The instinct of self-preservation stirred within her. She sprang from the terrace, and rushed away down the drive.

At the end of a few yards she looked back, and saw a stout, elderly muffled figure puffing after her through the snow. She recognized the Whitehaven surgeon, and waited for him to come up. He gave a nervous start at sight of her.

"Heaven bless my soul! How you frightened me! Why, it's Polly—Polly Lawless. What are you doing here, girl? Is the old man worse?"

She came close up to him, the snow falling on her uncovered head, her great eyes shining like moons.

"Dad is well enough," she answered, hoarsely, as she pointed up to the great house. "Tell me—tell me about him."

The doctor eyed her severely. Of late, the name of this handsome creature had been coupled with Nigel Kave's to a damaging extent.

"My poor child," he said, dryly, "you had better go home and attend to your father."

She grasped his arm violently.

"Tell me about him, I say! Why are you at Holmwood? Can you bring dead men back to life?"

"Mr. Kave is not dead. He still breathes," said the doctor. "He has met with a shocking accident. That is all there is to tell."

She gave a shrill, strange laugh.

"Accident!"

"Yes; he was conscious just five minutes after he was brought home. He distinctly said, 'It was an accident. I charge you all to bear witness to these words after my death. Let no one be suspected. It was an accident. I did it myself.' Since then he has been insensible."

A two-edged sword seemed driving through the girl's heart. His last conscious thought had been to shield her.

"You say he still breathes?" she cried, fiercely. "Oh, save him! What is your art good for if you cannot save him?"

"You absurd child," answered the doctor, irritably; "he will be dead as a door-nail before the dawn of Christmas morning. Doctors cannot perform miracles. I call it a most mysterious affair——"

She waited for nothing more, but shot through the gate, and was gone in an instant down the windy street.

An agony of remorse, a flood-tide of reviving passion suddenly swallowed up all her anger, all her burning sense of wrong. She reached a railroad crossing. A late train was just thundering into Whitehaven. The great headlight of the engine glared like a Cyclops eye in the storm; the cars flashed and rumbled after. Polly watched them, little dreaming of the Christmas gift they were bringing to her. She felt a mad impulse to fling herself under those grinding iron wheels, and so put an end to the pain which was wringing her heart; but the thought of old Jack Lawless restrained her. The train puffed on into the station, and a few minutes later Polly had reached the shanty on the beach.

As she opened the door she saw that her father was awake. He had lifted himself to his elbow, and was gazing around the low, poor room, as if in search of some one. A change had come over his face. It looked more drawn and pinched than ever, but consciousness had returned to it, and reason.

"Polly, is that you?" he faltered.

She shook the snow from her coarse garments, and advanced to the bunk.

"Yes, dad. I've been out for a run on the beach. It's time for the medicine again."

She poured a draught, and would have held it to his lips, but he pushed it away. A great excitement shone in his hollow eyes, and quivered over his haggard face.

"No. I want no more doctor's stuff. I'm a-sinking fast, Polly. Come nearer. It was the train that woke me, screeching into Whitehaven. I wonder if it has brought her? 'Twould be mortal queer if she should happen along to-night."

"She—who?" queried Polly, blankly.

He pressed his rough hand to his head.

"I've sent for a lady to visit us, my lass—a lady from over the sea. Oh, Lord! it's a long journey, but she'll come—nothing but death can keep her."

"Dad, dad, what are you talking about?" cried Polly, startled into something like interest.

He stared in a weak, bewildered way, around the room.

"I'm agoing fast, I say. I may be gone afore she gets here—I mean, your mother!"

"My mother! I have none. She died years ago," said the girl, in amazement.

A CHRISTMAS IDYL.—"HE HAS BEEN HERE!"

"No. That was the lie I had to tell to keep you from asking awkward questions, lass. Ah, God knows I've wronged you sorely. And you've been a good daughter to me always."

She thought he was raving. She stroked his poor face remorsefully, and answered:

"Have I? Oh, I'm afraid not, dad! I've kept things from you. I've deceived you again and again——"

"Tut—tut! What do sins like yours signify, Polly? The talking to that young Kave, when I forbid it, the meeting with him on the beach, and sich like? It's black ones, like mine, that weigh heavy!" and he gave a deep groan. Polly leaned over him. Would the horrors of this Christmas Eve ever cease?

"Dear dad," she said, in a soothing tone, "I'm afraid the delirium is coming back."

"No," he answered, firmly, "my head's clear. I know what I'm about. Give me that brandy-bottle on the table—it's worth all the doctor's drugs. Now, I'm going to tell you a story, Polly. Lord, Lord, how I wish she would come!"

He paused in a listening attitude, with eyes fixed on the door, but nothing was heard save the roar of the sea, and the noise of the wind driving the snow against the shanty.

"Seventeen years or more ago," began Jack Lawless, turning his hollow eyes darkly on the girl, "far away in England—a country that you know nothing about, lass—looking after the few hares and pheasants of a small, poor, Devon manor, lived a gamekeeper, called Gypsy Jack. He had Romany blood in his veins, and a good deal of Romany devil in his heart, and, worst of all, he fell in love with a lady of quality, a pretty young creature, with not a shilling on earth, but plenty of pride and pedigree, mind—in short, his master's daughter. Because she was kind and condescending to him, as she was to everybody, this black-browed idiot fancied that he could win her, and he went on nursing the delusion, until one day—Lord love you!—a fine lover appeared at the manor—handsome, well-born, and eager to marry. Well, what did the fool do then, lass? Why, he went mad with rage and jealousy. That same night, he came upon the young lady in a walk of yew-trees near the old house, and there was a scene. He had made a mistake, you see, and the minute he began to talk of love to her, she overwhelmed him with scorn and wrath. A good deal was said that better have been left unsaid. She turned the lover that would have died for her into a devil who swore then and there to take a devil's vengeance on her, whenever the chance should come. He was no nice gentleman—this Gypsy Jack—and he got a little rude, and she screamed, and lo! her fine lover steps out from among the trees, and knocks the gamekeeper senseless. It was a blow that both paid dear for at a later day.

"Well, of course, Jack lost his place, and he went up to London, and fell in bad company, and the next Christmas Eve the young lady he both loved and hated married her heart's choice, and went to live in Kent. After a while Jack heard that a child had been born to her—a daughter.

"Are you listening, Polly? Pauline you was christened, after your mother, but I like Polly better. The second Christmas following that marriage, Jack dressed himself in woman's toggery, and tramped off to find the nest of the happy pair. He reached it late at night. My lord and lady had gone to a Christmas ball, and the lackeys were all making merry in the servants' hall. Jack climbed a Spanish chestnut-tree that grew convenient to the nursery-window, and saw the little kid lying asleep on a lace pillow, under a silken coverlid, watched only by one stupid maid. 'Twas no time for ceremony, so he just flung up the casement, rapped the girl on the head, caught up the young one, and made off with her, still sleeping, all as easy and nice as you please.

"Well, rewards were offered, and detectives set to work, and all that; but Jack lay low in London till the hue-and-cry was over, then he sailed for Canada, and the little one with him, dressed in rags, like a beggar's child.

"'I'm a widower,' says he, 'and this toddler belongs to me.' Nobody doubted his word, and Polly Lawless you've been from that day to this!"

He paused, gasping for breath. The girl stared at him in stony amaze, but spoke no word.

"Yes, lass," went on the dying man, "I'm Gypsy Jack, and you're the child I stole from that Kent grange, just fifteen years ago this very night. From Canada, you see, I drifted into the States, and set to fishing in these waters. Not long since I had news of your mother from a pal of mine in England. She's a childless widow now, mourning late and early for her dead husband and the daughter that was lost and never found. Another drop of the brandy, girl! When I heard that, and when I felt my strength a-going, I says to myself, 'I've reached the end of my rope! I've got to die, and what will the lass do then? I'd better give her back to her that she belongs to!' And so, a few weeks ago I sent a letter, telling my lady to come and take you. Great God! She's had a sore heart for fifteen years. She will come—never fear. Hark!"

His death-stricken face had put on a look of mingled fear and expectation. He strained his dull ears to catch some sound outside the shanty. Polly sprang to her feet with a scream.

"Dad, dad, are you telling me the truth?"

"As God hears me, the whole truth, girl. I never had wife or child—you're none of mine—hark! I say! There's somebody at the door."

In awful, breathless silence, Polly listened. Was it the sea she heard, or the sound of horse-hoofs in the snow, the murmur of voices? A hand touched the latch, it was lifted tremulously, and out of the bitter storm, out of the wild, Christmas night, a woman stepped, unannounced, into the shanty.

He started up on his pillow.

"My God! Yes, it is you—fifteen years this very night—you are greatly changed—I swore vengeance—do you remember?—cruel—'twas cruel—poor Polly!——"

His voice died in a groan. No further sound came from his paralyzed lips. It was too late to confess wrong or ask pardon. A convulsive shudder shook his gaunt figure. He stretched out one hand, touched Polly, and fell back in his rude bunk, stone dead!

Then the lady in widow's weeds turned and looked at the girl—a look beyond all words to describe. Something she saw in that beautiful, breathless face that struck conviction to her very heart. She opened her arms. Polly ran into them with a great cry.

"Mother!—oh, are you my mother?"

"I am your mother! My child, my poor defrauded child!"

In the cold, clear Christmas morning Marcia Tudor opened the low door and entered the shanty on the beach. She found no one there but an old fisherman watching by the stark body of English Jack.

"I wish to see the girl called Polly Lawless!" said Miss Tudor, haughtily.

"She's gone, miss," answered the man.

"Gone! whither?"

"That's what I don't know. A lady came here last night and claimed Polly for her own darter, and took her away. It seems she wasn't old Jack's girl at all—I always suspected there was something queer in the fellow's past life. She had a full purse—that lady—and she was of the real quality. She left plenty of money for the burial, but she just whisked Polly off before daylight, and nobody in these parts, I'm thinking, will ever lay eyes on the girl again."

Five years have come and gone. Again it is Christmas Eve—Christmas far away from the bleak New England coast, under the intensely blue sky of the South, among the palms and orange trees of Nice.

Evening is falling on the blue Mediterranean and over the olive-fringed hills, the snow-capped Alps and the gay town, crowded with invalids and pleasure-seekers from every civilized nation of earth. Christmas always brings fine weather to the Riviera. There is not a cloud in the heavens, the afternoon mistral has died away, the air is like balm. In the villa gardens roses are blowing. Along the Promenade des Anglais palms wave and lights shine from the windows of the club-houses. The Place de la Poissonière is gay with showy carriages. A Babel of tongues resounds on all sides, It is a festive night in Nice—the coming of the world's great holiday is being celebrated in this Southern Eden with joyful enthusiasm.

Two men stroll up from the Quai Massena and enter the square, where the statue of the French hero looks gravely down on stranger multitudes. One of the twain is an American, tawny, stalwart, yet with an appearance of ill-health. His left arm hangs paralyzed by his side. Nigel Kave has never used that arm since the tragic night, five years agone, when Polly Lawless's bullet struck the bone and made it ever more a dead and useless thing. Kave has grown old and stern in these five years. There is a look of care and weariness unspeakable in his dark, handsome face. All the old weak carelessness is gone. The experience, from which he barely escaped with life, has sobered and changed the man almost beyond recognition. His companion, a young Englishman, is gazing around with amused eyes.

"Gad! old boy," he says, "it looks little like an English Christmas, eh? Behold the scene! Have we stumbled on fairyland? I hope your republican pocket is well filled. We shall not escape from this snare with a single sou."

They have reached a bazaar, flooded with gaslight and thronged with people. Rich strains of music fill the air. Great booths, ablaze with the golden fire of Venetian lamps, display wares of every description. Fair attendants—yellow-haired

A woman who had traveled thousands of weary miles in the hope of finding a long-lost treasure. On her pale, sad face the history of fifteen years of lonely bereavement and heart-sickness was plainly written. She was dressed in deepest black. A long, fur mantle covered her slight figure. Like a spirit she glided into the low, poor New England room, where that man lay gasping in death, where that girl, in her splendid panther-like beauty, stood waiting for the Christmas gift of a mother, whose very existence she had been ignorant of one little hour before.

She walked straight up to the bunk—this black-robed woman—her anxious, questioning eyes met the wild, dying ones of English Jack.

"You sent for me, and I have come," she said. "Now, where is my child?"

English girls; Russian dames of title; high-born French and Australian beauties, are luring both the wary and unwary to pause and buy. "Charity holds a Christmas fair here in aid of the Szegedin sufferers, or something of that sort," says Villiers, the Englishman.

Kave follows him into a Turkish kiosk, where the air is heavy with attar of roses, and an English peeress, attired like a Sultana, in strings of pearls and yellow satin, stiff with embroidery, dispenses flasks of perfume and porcelain cups of black coffee flavored with rose-water. A wonderful Chinese dame, in red Canton silk, with gold pins in her hair, and her yard-wide sleeves, edged with jewels, sells fans and lacquer-work in the next booth. The dazzling gas-jets and colored lanterns, the flags and streamers, the laughter and confusion of tongues, the superb colors and fantastic decorations bewilder, Kave. He is a stranger in Nice. As he passes the Chinese lady, she holds out to him an enormous fan, decorated with a flock of rice-birds.

"Will monsieur buy?" she pleads. "It is for the cause of charity!"

He flings down the money she demands, takes his fan and is moving on, when his eyes fall suddenly upon something that sends a mad thrill through every vein in his body.

It is a flower-stall, draped in vines—a perfect bower of roses and heliotropes and burning carnations. Christmas wreaths and crosses are on the counter, and behind it stands a girl of twenty or thereabouts, dressed in some thick, shining white stuff, with a necklace and girdle of Mediterranean violets. Her face is like a calla lily. She has blonde hair and wide gray eyes, with brows and lashes as black as ink. Kave sees a proud, red mouth, a creamy throat, a pair of half veiled arms, like marble, and he turns as white as chalk.

"In God's name, who is that?" he says to Villiers, and his Chinese fan falls crushed and broken, to the earth.

"The handsomest creature in Nice," answers the Englishman—"one of my own country women—Miss Pauline Darrow. Her mother, the widow of a baronet, is an invalid, and has come to the Riviera for her health. Bless me! Kave, what's the matter? You're shaking like a leaf!"

"Darrow!" echoes Nigel Kave, like a dazed man, "I do not know the name, and yet, great heaven, it is her face! I beg your pardon, Villiers—the young lady strongly resembles a person I once saw, years ago, in America!"

"Indeed! Gad! you're uncommonly fortunate to have seen anything like her in any country!" sighs Villiers. "I've heard some romantic story about her having been stolen in infancy, and brought up in a foreign country, but I dare say, it's pure fiction—Lady Darrow always frowns at the least allusion to it. This belle, Pauline, has lovers by the score. Look at that fellow elbowing his way to her stall. That's a Russian prince—has offered himself again and again, and refuses to take 'No' for an answer."

Stern and white, Kave stands and stares at the Russian—a good-looking youth.

"Bearded like a pard," he leans on the counter with his heart in his eyes, and speaks in French to the handsome flower girl.

"Your hands have touched all these wreaths and crosses, mademoiselle?"

"Yes, monsieur," answers Miss Darrow, with a faint, cold smile.

"I will take them—every one!"

He signs to a servant. In a moment the counter is swept bare. Then Miss Darrow unclasps her necklace and girdle of violets and lays them in the vacant place.

"In the name of charity!" she says.

Nigel Kave makes one stride forward. Is he asleep or awake? Is this fair woman the poor, wronged, desperate Polly Lawless, who so nearly closed his earthly career on wild Gibbet Hill just five years before? Is it Christmas Eve, and does he stand among palms and lights and flowers, face to face with her once more, or are all these things but the delusions of a disordered brain? He puts his one sound hand upon the necklace and girdle.

"Name your price, mademoiselle," he says.

She starts—for the first time she sees him, and it seems as if the beautiful Miss Darrow is about to faint. Her gray eyes dilate with mingled horror and amaze, as they flash over his tall form, his dark, agitated face, and rest, at last, on his crippled, helpless arm. It is not a dead, but a living man who stands before her. The Russian prince glares angrily at the stranger and cries:

"Let mademoiselle offer the flowers to the highest bidder."

That brings her to herself. She is again the deft saleswoman of a charity bazaar. There are a dozen competitors for the violets, but Kave and the Russian are the foremost. The contest waxes hot betwixt this pair. It is Kave who triumphs at last. He throws down a thousand francs and takes up the girdle and the necklace.

"These Americans have long purses," sneers the Russian.

Five minutes after Miss Darrow has vanished from the stall, and a pretty French marquise, dressed like a Florentine peasant, urges the sweet cause of charity in her stead.

As Kave and his friend leave the bazaar, the former says,

"To-morrow, Villiers, you must make Miss Darrow a Christmas call, and take me with you."

"By Jove! that's awfully cool!" answers Villiers. "I have heard that Lady Darrow detests Americans—so, perhaps, does the daughter. I am not sure that you would be welcome."

"All the same, I shall call," replied Kave, calmly smelling his dear-bought violets. "I have something of importance to say to these countrywomen of yours."

In sunshine and balm Christmas Day comes to Nice. Reluctant but unresisting, Villiers leads the way to the Darrow villa—a lovely spot, surrounded by lemon and orange trees, with glimpses of olive hills and sparkling sea and snowy Alps on every side. Lady Darrow is ill in her own room and cannot see visitors. Miss Darrow is in the garden. To the garden go Villiers and his friend.

"And ten to one," mutters the former, "we shall find that much-bewhiskered Russian with her."

In a grotto, shady with stately aloes and bright with laughing fountains and trailing vines, through which flowering geraniums hold up torches of fire, they discover Miss Darrow. She is dressed in black satin and yellow Mechlin lace, and, in honor of the day, a sprig of English holly is pinned to her corsage. A black Gainsborough hat shades her yellow hair and heightens the fairness of her face. In a bored, depressed way she leans against a piece of rockwork, and at her feet kneels the Russian.

"I love you, mademoiselle," he cries, passionately; "do not say me nay again—make me happy upon this good day."

She draws back, weary and scornful. Her lips quiver, as if with suppressed pain.

"You ask that which is impossible!" she answers, sadly. "I can marry no man!"

"But why?" he urges—"mademoiselle, tell me why?"

Nigel Kave pushes back the shrubbery, and stands before the pair.

"Because she already has a husband," he thunders. "I am he!" Then, as the Russian leaps to his feet, he adds, "Go, monsieur! I wish to speak to my wife alone!"

The Russian goes. Villiers also—dumb with amazement—beats a hasty retreat. Miss Darrow and Kave stand alone together in the Christmas sunshine.

"It is the truth!" he says, defiantly—"you are my wife! That night on Gibbet Hill, I believed from my soul that our marriage was null and void, but at a later day, I searched for and found the man who united us—found that he was a genuine clergyman, and that the ceremony had been legally performed. For years I have been seeking you to tell you this. You are mine till the divorce court separates us in proper form."

With golden head thrown back, and black, shining figure drawn up to its full height, she looks at him with scornful eyes.

"And you dare to claim me!" she cries—"you! who cast me off five years ago; you, who would have married another woman; you, who drove me to despair and madness and murder!"

"I have nothing to say for myself," he answers. "I was a weak, cowardly villain—it would have been but common justice had you destroyed me, as you intended. Yet I have suffered for my sin—I shall suffer till my dying day!"

She looks at his pale, worn face and paralyzed arm.

"Is that my work?" she says, slowly.

"Yes! and it's a thousand pities, Pauline, that your aim was not truer—a thousand pities that you should have missed my heart by only a few inches," he answers, bitterly.

Both faces are like death; both hearts are beating like trip-hammers.

"Miss Tudor and your mother," she says. "Where are they?"

"Miss Tudor is married; my mother is dead!"

She is silent for a moment, then she says proudly, "I have found home and relatives and fortune since our last meeting at Whitehaven. Polly Lawless, her wretched life, her mistakes and sorrows, seem now to me like a hideous dream."

"No doubt. The fortunate can afford to be magnanimous; can they not, Pauline? For years the thought of you has embittered my whole life—I have hungered long for your forgiveness—grant it to me now—it is all I dare ask of you!" He kneels humbly before her, as he once knelt on Gibbet Hill. "Be generous—say that I am pardoned—it will be something for me to remember in the years to come, when I can see your face no more!"

There is desperate pain in his voice. She trembles, her breath grows short.

"Have mercy!" he pleads. "I love you, and I have lost you forever—is not that punishment enough? This is Christmas, the time of peace—let there be peace between us, as we part—for part we must, I know that only too well!"

She turns her face from this man who has made her suffer cruelly, and who has also suffered much through her. He waits, but she utters no word, makes no sign.

"You will not?" he groans, at last. "You begrudge me even this consolation. Well, then, good-by, Pauline, and God bless you!"

He staggers to his feet and walks blindly down the nearest path. Only a few steps, then she is at his side.

"Oh, Nigel! my husband!" she falters. "Yes, I forgive everything! Have I not wellnigh destroyed you; have I not need of forgiveness myself?"

He turned with a cry. He sees the look in her face, and the next instant the two are in each other's arms.

Verily, love can pardon all things!

Pauline Darrow still loves this man, and for the sake of the infinite passion and remorse which fill his eyes and blanch his lips, she is content to forget the past, and receives him again to her heart of hearts.

"Come to my mother," she says, at last, as she lifts her head, with a long sigh, from his breast, "She knows our story—she will welcome you as a son, because she must, Nigel!"

And so, under the orange-trees, with the happy Christmas sun shining down upon them, they go up to the villa together.

"A NEW SUIT FOR CHRISTMAS."

IN this pleasant scene of homely German life, where the Christmas Tree has been duly prepared with its lanterns or tapers all ready to be lighted, and with its appointed gifts for the gratification of each member of the happy family, we behold the entrance of a bright, young person, Master Fritz, or Karl, or whatever his name, who is attired in a new suit of clothes for the festive occasion. Such boys have we seen in American homes, not less elated in spirit by the consciousness of a similar improvement in their outward covering, more especially at that momentous stage of first wearing the breeches, the trousers, or the "knickerbockers," which comes to male mankind once in a lifetime, with the sensation of advanced dignity, as a foretaste of the masterly prerogatives of their sex. The mother, or nurse, who has dressed this cheerful youngster in such a becoming fashion, seems little inclined to reprove his juvenile exhibition of personal vanity; and the kind old grandmother, as she looks up from the Bible to greet his approach, is delighted with the brave little man. We are not equally sure of the approval of his little sister, refraining as she does from a glance of admiring curiosity, and devoting her whole attention to the unconscious doll which is fondled in her lap. She may have her private opinion that "Brother" thinks too much of himself, and that men and boys, in general, are too apt to give themselves the air of Lords of Creation. As for the dog, we should like best of all to know his mind upon the subject, but the reader is quite as well able as we are to interpret the wondering wistfulness of his look, and the subdued agitation of his bushy tail. The father's old jacket, hanging beside the door, might be pointed to as a reminder that this urchin will not very often get a new suit of clothes, and that he must learn betimes to work for his own needs.

CHRISTMAS NIGHT.

THE old wolf squats on her haunches thin,
In the mountain path where fir-trees grow,
While Christmas bells make merry din
In the red-roofed town below.

Her fangs are keen, and her coat is gray,
And her eyes are red with hellish light;
In the ice and snow of the frozen way
She waits this festive night—

Waits for a step, and the merry sound
Of a strong voice, lilting an old love tune,
And a shadow cast on the flinty ground
Under the Christmas moon.

The black firs stand in a solemn row,
The white frost glistens, the hour grows late,
But the old wolf there, in her lair of snow,
Watches, as stern as Fate.

Like a stag, he climbs the frozen fell,
Under the crag his fleet foot rings;
In the shade of the firs, so thick and tall,
This is the song he sings:

"In yon sky the Christmas star,
Like thy sweet eyes, shines afar,
Birgit, Birgit, maid adored!
As the brown bark to the tree,
Reaches thy lover's heart to thee,
As the blue mist to the sea,
As the scabbard round the sword!
Through the Christmas dance to-night
Then did'st move, a dream of light,
Fairest of the village maids.
For thy love I wait, my sweet,
Like the hills for Summer's heat,
Like the wild deer for the glades—
Yea, I wait, I sigh forlorn,
As the forest for the leaf,
As the darkness for the morn,
As the valleys for the corn,
As the garner for the sheaf.
Heed my sorrow, heed my sighs,
Melts my soul beneath thine eyes,
As the glacier 'neath the sun.
Birgit, Birgit, unto thee,
Like the brown brooks to the sea,
All my thoughts and wishes run."

With shudder and shriek the wind goes by,
In fringes grey the tan clouds float,
Across the moon, and the black firs sigh,
And the old wolf leaps at his throat!

And maiden Birgit, in happy mood,
Sleeps on in the red-roofed town below—
Sleeps, knowing not that her lover's blood
Reddens the Christmas snow!

ETTA W. PIERCE.

THE LAW OF LOVE.

By Annie J. Duffett.

IT was only a woman—a dying woman—and after the first shock the crowd surges on. But I—I cannot take my gaze from the pallid face, as she lies upon the platform, whither they have dragged her, crushed and mangled, from the car-wheels. But when somebody throws a sheet over her I turn to my friends, who have just alighted from the London express. There is a swift din of aristocratic voices as we go towards the two carriages in waiting, then a sudden pause, as our guests perceive that long form prostrate upon the platform.

"Is it not horrible?" cries Lady Agathe, in her sweet, high treble. "A drunken woman—she got run over. And—will you believe it?—I came within an inch of the same fate myself. I dropped my pocketbook in crossing the track from the carriage. In stooping to pick it up I was seized with a deadly faintness, and almost lost consciousness. The rest of the party had moved on without noticing me. People shouted at me, but I could not move. Suddenly something fell against me with such force that it pushed me off the track. It must have been this poor creature. You see, the train was right up on us, and, being intoxicated, she could not save herself, and so got under the wheels."

"It was fortunate for you, Agathe, that the poor wretch should have stumbled upon you; it saved your life!" says Fane Swinton—her husband's friend. There is a queer, pale look about his face, unnatural to it. But Lady Agathe's lovely countenance bears no trace of any emotion at her narrow escape from death.

That was an hour ago. I stand now beside a cot in the hospital, whither I have followed the victim of that accident—it being impossible for me to subdue the intense interest her appearance inspired in me. This ward is very silent—it being only used for cases of the worst order, and, happily, of these there are few—this Christmas Eve. I sit and look at the dying woman. She is scarcely more than a girl; and though her limbs are terribly mangled, her face is utterly untouched. It is a little brown, winsome face, though pitifully hollow about the eyes and the cheeks, and with a downward drooping of pathos and pain around the corners of the lips, that sends an ache to my throat as I look—a face that seems to speak of the barn and the byre, the meadow and the hills, of a distant and forsaken home—of old safe ways from which she has strayed a pitiful distance—of a nook and a chair and hearts that are vacant around a desolate hearth! Somehow the tears rise to my eyes as I watch that face, doubtless once so bonnie and so brown; I think it must be the worn, piteous look of it that causes them, and that persistent association with running waters, in which cattle stand hock-deep, of the girl lying upon the bank amid the cowslip and the wild thyme, and of the linnet-song that pours from her lips as the kine come home. And now she lies before me a mass of mangled flesh, with a brand upon her forehead and her poor little soul, that has strayed a sorry way from the right. Suddenly, as I look, the closed eyes flash wide; they are brown—that same pretty, soft-brown hue of the chestnuts she used to gather, when the early frosts had stained the birches and the hickory woods, where the gray squirrels gamboled, and the sound of dropping nuts cleft the air. I bend over the little vacant, worn face, far over, until I catch the great wistful light of the death-scourged eyes.

"Do you want anything?" I ask.

"Yes, him!"

"Who? dear?"

"Oh! you don't know. I forget," turning wearily upon the pillow. Then abruptly—"Twenty years ago, to-night, I was born—Christmas Eve. They called me Madelon. And two years ago, to-night, my own baby was born—little Jeanette, after the dear one at home—and to-night I am dying, but I do not regret it: to the end, I have, given him my life. To-night I saved the woman of his love."

I start quickly: somehow that white, haggard look on Fane Swinton's countenance returns to me in this moment.

"Did you know Lord Swinton?" I query.

"Yes, I knew him," she replies, with a little pallid smile that has a pathos never held in tears—"I knew him! I met him on the hills at home. I went away with him when he went, for I loved him too well to let him go alone. I have never seen the dear ones since! I came to London. I was happy. I wonder if heaven has such happiness as was mine, then? He promised to marry me, and he would have done so, but he saw Lady Agathe, and he loved her with a love that he never gave me. He tried hard to keep from it at first; he knew his danger. 'Oh, Madelon!' he would say, 'keep me with you—dear little true heart, stay by me! I will not yield to her—I will not!' And he would stagger into my room some night, as though drunk with wine. It was her. She did it—she won him because he was proud and beautiful. They say they do those things in the world to which she belongs: they call it friendship! It brings no disgrace. Lady Agathe is very dear to her husband and children. Yet when I begged of her to take me as her servant, hoping that by that I would see him, I was driven from her presence. They told me that I had no honor, no character! Can you understand these things, lady?"

The beautiful, nut-brown eyes look yearningly into mine—the dry, parched lips quiver.

"No," I say, while a great shame for my own caste sweeps me. "I cannot understand them."

"There are some things as strange in life," continues the plaintive voice—strange to say, she seems to be perfectly painless. "Well, he could no longer hold out. She won him from me. Then I went away—I would not take his money when he had no love! I went away; and I have been hungry and cold and homeless. I have been faint and ill and parched with the heat of this terrible city. I have hungered after the dear old home on the hillside, and the woods and the meadows, with their cowslips and primroses, and the stream that sang from dawn until night, and the sheep that I watched; but oh, dear God! I have been true to him—true to him, though I held no place in his heart. And two years ago to-night my baby came, and from my heart the pain and the ache seemed lifted. I was happy—happy as I had not been since I left the old place. I lay in an attic, and the roof was poor, and it was very cold. But it was not a manger! My baby was in my arms, and I lay and thought of the dear Child that was born so many years ago that night. I liked to feel that I lay like Mary had lain, and through the chinks in the roof I saw the stars, and I wondered which it was that had shown where the Baby was in Judea. And I thought God had sent mine to be a comfort to me. But in the morning officers came and they took the child away. It was not mine any more. They were not brutal; they explained how that the city owned it, and must take care of its poor. They said my shame and dishonor were too great for me to be a suitable guardian for it! How could that be? I was its mother! Then took it away. Ah, dear God! I thought I should die! I lay there and I looked out of the roof; but I felt the cold as I had not felt it the night before, and a vail was over the stars! Never again would it lay at my breast—never again upon my ears would fall its wailing cry, or its little limbs nestle at my side! Then like a flash it came to me that Mary, too, had mourned for her Child. Did I suffer as she suffered when she followed her son to Calvary? Ah! I know how she felt when she saw Him bearing the Cross along that weary, weary way! I know how her heart ached! I know what thoughts came to her of the time when He was a little baby in the manger, with Joseph and her, and the oxen around! You see, we never know what our babies are born for! So it was that that helped me to bear it. But I cannot understand what title the city had to my child."

Again she looks at me questioningly. Her voice is still low and mellow as the thrush's song; as yet no wail of dying agony has pierced it. Her face is calm as the burn that flows through the little hillside farm, though her weary limbs are crushed and torn out of all shape. She is dying—here in the great city, far away from that home she forsook. And while her eyes grow dim and sightless, and the cold dew starts upon her brow, perchance her mother is praying in the solemn silence of this holy night, praying for the prettiest, sunniest child of them all, who has gone out from their lives forever.

"Can you understand why it was not my child?" she whispers. Poor, little wayward soul! to her crude and untutored instincts life with its mystery and mockery is a problem, whose injustice she even yet strives to solve.

No, I cannot tell. I am fast sharing her sophistry. The mandates, the customs, the narrow prejudices of society sink into insignificance before the solemn questioning of those death-filled eyes. I seem to see the divine face of Mary's Son, as He said, "A new commandment give I unto you: that ye love one another!" Where is that "love," and that "Charity that seeth no evil!" that should have been shown this poor, helpless, friendless one?

"But it doesn't matter, now—the sin is sinned, the pain is over!" she murmurs, in that strange pathos that so surprises me in one of her order. "I know that I am dying. But if only I might—I would like to see him once again!"

"You shall!" I say, while that heavy ache is still at my throat. "Fane Swinton is my brother's son. I have the right to send for him!"

I sit by her side and wait. A solemn, brooding presence fills the room. Outside, the gay world is reveling in its Christmas festivities, and anon a sweet, wild burst of riotous music breaks from without. And amidst it all the girl lies dying. But as the horns and the organs pierce occasionally to her senses that are fast dulling to earthly things, memories of the old, sweet, unforgotten time are flung across her. I see her lips move; I bend lower and catch their whispers:

"I have fetched the nuts, mother, and the fire burns bright. See! how the red berries glisten on the wall. And do you hear the sleigh-bells on the hill? They must be coming, mother!" Poor child! for her the hawthorn and the juniper have been hung the last time; and never again will she stand within the walls of her old home, with the Christmas-bells ringing out all over the snowy land.

At last the door opens, and Fane Swinton enters. He comes straight to the cot; and as he sees the poor little, once russet face, a great cry breaks from him:

"Madelon! Madelon!"

But who shall tell the glory, the refulgent radiance that sweeps that dying face as the girl reaches out and takes the strong, warm hand of the man—takes it with her quivering, dark fingers that have strayed so often among the strawberries and wild thyme of those sun-kissed meadow-lands from which he tore her.

"Oh! my dear—my dear!" she whispers, while she presses it to her lips, that are white and dry as dust.

"Don't!" he cries, "it kills me!" Then, after a pause—"But Madelon, believe me! I searched far and wide for you. I would never have allowed you to suffer one pang from bodily want. I——"

"It was not your fortune I wanted!" she interrupts, with a piteous, broken smile. "It was your heart. But we will let that pass. Do you know why I am here to-night?" abruptly.

"In her note my aunt tells me that you have met with some accident—got run over. Oh! Madelon, this is too shocking!"

"Yes"—slowly—"I got run over in her stead. Can't you guess the rest, Fane? I saw her pause upon the crossing; she seemed not to heed the train that was almost upon her. I know what it is to lose the one you worship! So I pushed her away; I did it, Fane, because you loved her so!" She is broken and mangled, like a crushed fawn—all her poor little limbs shapeless and torn; she has lain herself a living sacrifice upon the altar of her love; the throes of approaching dissolution are beginning to rack her form. But a smile is in her eyes—a smile proud and full of peace! The blight and the sin of those dead years are rolled aside—the spirit, suddenly divested of its weaknesses, has soared upwards to the sublimity of divine love. And from the haughty soul of Fane—Lord Swinton—goes a cry of intolerable anguish and remorse.

"Madelon!" he cries, "poor, little faithful soul! I am not worth the sacrifice!"

But she does not heed his words; earth and its cares have fated from her—her mission is done! She lies there motionless, her small, crushed breast heaving slowly, while the waters surge up and touch her weary, waiting feet. We stand silent, daring not to speak in the presence of this fleeting spirit, with its martyrdom. And as I look downwards into the poor brown eyes, without sight or reason in them, her parched lips move; again I catch the murmur of the "hawthorn" and the "juniper." And I know that in this last solemn moment of all her hurt and weary soul has flown back to her lost home, and perchance is communing with that desolate mother in her lonely night-watch.

Suddenly her hand reaches out in a groping way, and her voice rings clear and sweet:

"I am going, Fane; but I have nothing to fear; a mother stands ready to plead for me with her Son! She knows how all such as I have loved and suffered and lost! It is Mary—Mary, whose Child was crucified!"

One sharp convulsive tightening of the frail fingers which even in death cling to the hand that meted out to her destruction, and the tired spirit lays down its burden. She has gone away—away from the sin and the bondage of life—away, without priest or prayer, but in the dear, sacred tide of the "Christ-mass." And together we stand and look at her clay.

She was only a little, nameless thing, who had watched the sheep on her father's hills, and she had been jostled hither and yon in life, and thrust out as too unclean to mingle with those who styled themselves honest. But as I look into those sightless eyes—as my gaze dwells upon the shapeless mass that is all that remains of the once winsome maiden, I feel that I would rather take her hope of heaven than Agatha's—Lady Vanasburn—whose spotless character has been untouched by her society-friendship, wrapped as she is in the rank and prestige of her Norman lord. Far be it from me to say that this poor dead one was guiltless; but what I claim for her is this: "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone at her."

The Christmas bells clash out suddenly over the great city. The midnight is past, and I think of Him whose birth they wring for—that Baby who in the infinite wisdom and mercy of after years said to the Magdalen: "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much!" and I wonder where on earth I may go this Christmas morning to find that blessed pardon and divine charity.

What is passing in the mind of Fane Swinton I never know, but he goes out from that chamber of death an altered man; and Society, with its hollow deceptions and narrow prejudices, know him no more.

She lies there dead when the world wakes to its gayety and riotous mirth—that poor little brown, wicked thing, once bright as a berry of the yew, who had got away from the balm and the hush of her old safe home—the sloping hills and spreading vineyards! And far away the cotter's wife carries a heavy heart, thinking of the child who had come to her twenty years ago that morn.

One last look I take of the dead one and then go out from her forever, leaving the man by her side. Outside the carriages sweep in hundreds through the streets, and the fashionable throng rushes on with never a thought or care. But I feel very sober as I betake myself to my home; and as my children of noble birth rush to meet me with Christmas greetings, I think of that mother dead in the hospital, and of her little nameless one somewhere upon the earth, friendless and alone.

From the morning paper Lady Agathe reads to her husband an account of the accident: "A drunken woman got run over by last night's express—the one I told you about, you know."

That is all! but it does not matter: she is gone where no earthly sentence can touch her—to be judged by a judgment not human and a charity divine. And if upon this morning Mary has any favor to ask of her Son, in the name of her dear maternity, I think it is mercy for such as she.

Thank heaven! man's laws are not God's!

IN A POCKET.

"WELL, well," said good Adonijah Courtney, raising his eyes heavenward, "Providence has indeed afflicted us; but should we mourn as those without hope? Nay, surely not, since all flesh is weak and unable to meet and withstand temptation in its own strength; and our dear boy, Lionel—ah, why did our brother, Reuben, bestow upon his offspring that brutish name, though he has made us to grieve for his shortcoming—still gives us hope of his repentance. All is not lost, sister Keziah," and he pressed his spinster companion's withered and trembling hand reassuringly, as he bade his pretty, tearful niece (the culprit's sister), to re-read the letter of confession that had that evening burst like a bombshell in their midst and caused the good and simple-minded people great sorrow and anxiety of mind.

Lily Courtney held her brother's singularly jerky and illegibly-written epistle open before her. Indeed she had never closed it since it came, but continued to pore over its shaky characters in the vague hope of gleaning a ray of light to illumine the murky record. At her uncle's request, she tried hard to swallow the painful lump that had been apparently growing in her throat ever since her startled mind took in the wretched tidings. She was a gentle, shy-mannered girl, of great personal beauty and (wondrous combination) equal modesty; but her strong, and as yet untried, trait of character was unselfish devotion. She loved the dear old pair who had received her brother and herself in their early orphanage, and who had given their every energy and thought to the education and moral training of the otherwise friendless children. Without ever having been outside of Greenville—since she came there a little girl ten years before—Lily knew quite well that her aunt and uncle were singularly innocent and unworldly people, and, though she could not help but fall into many of their primitive ways and illogical views, she was quite sure that neither of them was fitted to start off in Winter and travel to the great city where her poor dear brother was in trouble. She had quite resolved from the first that she would go to him herself, and when her voice trembled and the choking sensation oppressed her most as she read on, it was when the conflict between her native timidity and courageous sense of duty occurred.

The note was dated a day or two before Christmas and written in pencil so badly that it was difficult to read. Its style, too, was unlike Lionel's; in fact, there was no way to account for its abrupt and uneven character except the true one. The dreadful snares and temptations of that frightful city, against which the elder pair, who had never passed a night in its polluted air, had so faithfully warned him—had seized him in their illusive grasp. He had succumbed; he had strayed and fallen from grace; some evil being had robbed him, and now, contrite and helpless, he called homewards for relief. His scrawling epistle ran thus:

"MY DEAR UNCLE AND AUNT - I don't want Lily to be alarmed (poor child, it was she who had opened the note), so I do not include her. I have had a misfortune—I trusted to myself in these slippery ways. I was a fool not to listen to counsel—but I thought I knew it all; the result is, I became lost, grew confused and fell. Do not alarm yourself, dear aunt and uncle; I might have been much worse. As it is, in the confusion, I lost my pocketbook. The people among whom, on coming to myself, I proved to be, are not of the class for me to remain dependent on for a single day. Please send or come. Inclose address. Regret to alarm you. With love, LIONEL."

In a different hand was a complicated direction, which Lily carefully detached and put in her pocketbook.

That was the first step taken—the rest followed quickly:

"Uncle and aunt, I am going to the city. My mind is quite made up, and please do not say No. You, dear uncle, are suffering with one of your worst attacks of rheumatism, and aunt's head is threatened with her regular January neuralgia. Martha is needed to look after you both, and Simon can't leave the barn, poor old man. As for me, I was nine years old when I was there last, but I remember the streets perfectly. I could even go to this place"—she pointed to the direction in the pocketbook—"after a little studying of the localities."

She spoke so confident, looked so brave, and withal so hopeful, that the good couple could only accept her strength of purpose as providential, and "send" for the trying occasion.

They had many doubts and anxieties still, but a feeling of thankfulness prevailed over all the rest.

"The child is wonderfully led, it seems," said Adonijah; "she speaks as if she was sure of the way before her, and I believe that she will be sustained, Keziah."

"Yes," affirmed the good spinster, though she spoke a little tremulously. "I also feel to rejoice that she is able to meet the emergency. There is no time to be lost; she must go in the first train, and we must to-night prepare everything for the morrow."

* * * * *

It was over. On Christmas day she sat in the centre of the middle car of the train—safest place in case of accidents. The cold air had frozen the tears on her cheeks; she looked through the blurred window at the dark outline of the old family carriage which Simon was driving up the lane homewards, and sent the venerable occupants a silent kiss pressed against the unsympathetic glass. Dear souls! they were talking of her, and already regretting having permitted her to go.

"Innocent young flower, that she is," said Aunt Keziah, with a stifled sob, "if her brother fell into trouble, how will she escape?"

"She has had much good counsel, and she will heed it," said Adonijah.

So she had. It made her head dizzy trying to remember it all—it was impossible. She could never hope to retain so many wise admonitions; therefore, as a too heavily freighted ship will in stress of weather part with her less valuable cargo, and keep only such precious goods as shall permit easy sailing, so Lily, with her pocketbook containing all her money and the address of her brother to guard, allowed all else to slip by for the present, being convinced that they were the essential treasures of her journey.

The train was a full one; at every station new people came in, and at the second place from Greenville a gentleman, of excellent appearance and pleasing manner, came in and found no vacant place except the one beside Lily.

He wore a handsome sable-collar round his overcoat; in Lily's startled eye it seemed like a partial mask to his face, and when, pointing to the seat, he bowed his request to be allowed to share it, she assented with a start, and immediately placed her hand protectingly over her coat-pocket where her money was. She had merely turned her face once towards the newcomer; that once, however, was quite sufficient to show him a pure, oval outline, eyes soft as velvet and lovely brown in color, a straight nose, and a mobile, red-lipped mouth—a little compressed and formal in its set—but sweet as an opening bud in June.

Apparently the stranger was susceptible to female loveliness; he threw off his fur wrapping, adjusted his coat-collar, and gave a becoming touch to his hat. He was young and good-looking, and seemed decidedly drawn towards the face that had been quickly averted from his view.

Lily looked steadily out of the window, and tried to think of her dear, but unfortunate brother, who had left home to enjoy a brief holiday before choosing a profession, and so soon fallen into life's "slippery ways."

"What a pity it is that evil lurks under the most pleasing exteriors," she said to herself, with a sigh, and then she took a furtive peep out of the corner of her eye at her handsome companion, which caused her to sigh again.

Yes, he was very prepossessing, but it was of just such as he that she had always been told to beware. Evil delighted to put on an alluring guise: but it was to entrap the unwary, and a charming, smiling exterior was too frequently the mask of the tempter.

These solemn warnings all recurred to her mind faithfully, but somehow they gave her no great pleasure.

"It is a pity!" she said, and looked out on the wintry prospect, with a fine sharp snow sifting through the gray air and the bare tree-boughs shivering in the wind.

The shawl that Aunt Keziah's thoughtfulness had added to her niece's wrappings, slipped off her knee upon the floor; the observant stranger quickly stooped to lift it. Lily bent down also, their faces nearly met, and both were forced to smile.

"I beg your pardon!" said Lily, mechanically. Oh, how her face flushed the minute after! She had been the first to speak, and had actually addressed herself to a stranger!

"I am the one to apologize! I am very awkward, I assure!" cried the young man, elaborately replacing the wrapping.

Lily recovered her self-possession, bowed coldly, and again took refuge in peering into the gloomy outer world.

Suddenly, without a note of preparation, they shot into a huge dark tunnel. The transition from day to night was so swift that Lily almost screamed, and, do what she would to recover from the shock, her heart kept beating so that she could scarcely breathe.

Here was a situation totally unlooked for. Neither her aunt nor her uncle had prepared her mind for this—alone in the darkness, at the mercy of this deceptive and wily stranger, who had, no doubt, many subtle mechanical contrivances at command for extracting pocket-books from the possession of country victims!

Her breath came shorter; she fancied she already felt something touch her pocket. She was no coward—no, she would defend herself—she would not submit to lose her treasure—those crisp green notes of large denomination that were to save Lionel, and put him straight in the paths of rectitude once more. The thought gave her courage; she slipped her hand softly along the thick beaver cloth, plunged it quickly into the pocket and caught a man's hand firmly in her own! Ah! well, it was done, and she had it in a strong tight grip, from which, strange to say, it made no effort to free itself; but, though triumphant, no one could ever tell what that act of justice, that defense of right, had cost her!

As she held the guilty member prisoner, her tender woman's heart softened and plead for the offender against her sterner judgment. It was a struggle and a hard one—he might be young in crime, the victim of temptation, of untoward circumstances; she would not give him over to punishment; she would rather shield him from retribution; but she must protect her money.

A pale, grayish atmosphere about them lasts an instant, then out they flash into the clear, bright day, upon which the laggard, wintry sun has just poured a welcome flood of light, showing clearly to her own horrified vision and the deeply meditative gaze of her companion her little right hand thrust deep into his coat-pocket (which closely adjoined her own), and clinched with all the force of its pretty pinkish fingers around his quietly imprisoned digits.

There are some things that happen in everybody's life of which the one most nearly concerned knows nothing. Lily Courtney never till her dying day could tell how her hand got out of her neighbor's pocket. She somehow came to herself by-and-by in a dazed way, her forehead resting against the window-glass, and a succession of crimson blushes chasing each other over her burning cheeks. Covertly and by slow degrees she looked around. The seat was empty, the suspected pickpocket—of whom she would never think without heartfelt shame—had left her to her ruminations.

They were not very agreeable ones. She had been taught that we could not be too suspicious—she was ready henceforth to deny the assertion entirely.

"I wish I had been robbed rather than have put my hand——" she could go no further even in thought. A hot blush always interrupted her. "I hope I may never, never see that gentleman again!" she declared, energetically; yet even as she said so, she knew she did not quite mean it. There was time for no further mental conflict—thank goodness, there was the city! It was two in the afternoon.

Lily was just in that mood when one ceases to be confidential even with oneself. She would not acknowledge that she saw the stranger as she crossed the depot; she would not admit that she was dubious about the direction she should take to reach her brother; in fine, she was vexed and chagrined, uncertain and excited, and could not recognize herself as the resolute young heroine who had left Greenville that morning, relying on a store of good counsel, backed by her own sagacity.

At a little distance from the station she hailed a car, after hastily reading its lettered sides. When she consulted the conductor, she learned she was being carried out of her way, and with a shouted line or two of directions ringing after her she descended and took another with a varied but unsatisfactory result. She wished that she had not imbibed a prejudice against hacks and their drivers as being the accessories of mysterious disappearances she had read of in those awful city papers; but, tired and distracted as she was, after two hours' aimless car-changing and mistaking of points of the compass, she still could not trust herself, with night approaching, to one of those conveyances. She resolved rather to go on foot, asking her way block by block, and she swallowed back her tears and set out sturdily despite the cold. She forgot to be hungry, and was at last fairly on her way.

Then she saw—she could not tell just with what feeling—directly in advance of her the gentleman with the sable collar going the same way. After a time she ceased to ask and followed him blindly. She was half-benumbed now, and she murmured to herself—"I began by suspecting him—now I am trusting him in the dark!" True enough, night was coming on; they were turning into mean little streets, having come back in the neighborhood of the depot. A handsome carriage—whose driver seemed to have waited for the stranger—stood at the corner and received a gesture of direction from him. All three—he, Lily and the carriage, paused at a narrow door. It bore the number, and was in the street, Lionel had sent to Greenville. The gentleman knocked, then stood back for his companion to enter; the door opened into a close, dirty little room, where poor Lionel lay, on an untidy settee, in the act of being made ready for removal by a kind and genial old gentleman, a little hasty in temper, it seemed, for he called out at sight of the young man whose pocket Lily had explored—"Well, you've got here at last, have you, Frank Bently? I've waited long enough, I should say, and this poor boy suffering from a fracture and fever in a place like this. The people who picked him up insensible off the ice out beyond in the next street, have been very kind," he added, to the German shoemaker and his wife who stood by. "You found him with his head cut by his fall, his pocketbook lost or stolen, and carried him here where he wrote home—and this morning got his senses sufficiently about him to send for me, which was what he should have done at first." The doctor—for he was the doctor with whom Lionel had it in mind to study by-and-by—talked on in this strain to relieve an evident embarrassment.

Young Dr. Bently, his son, explained (while the sister and brother indulged in a singularly fervent embrace, considering that they had been but two days separated), that he had received his father's message per family servant on his arrival at the depot, at two o'clock, but that he was detained by a pressing and most imperative engagement—(he did not explain that said engagement was his own resolution to follow respectfully and unseen to her destination the pretty timid little Lily, of Greenville, who had, by the odd process of entering his pocket, stolen his heart. Such things will do to keep, as will also Lily's pleased amazement at the family misinterpretation of poor Lionel's letter, written in pain and fever. He, too, proud of his early recollections of the city ways, started on foot over its icy pavements and met with a physical, not a moral fall. That little mistake was explained and laughed over, but Lily did not want hers to share the same fate—to keep it secret she even bribed Frank Bently.

Once he threatened—"Oh, do not tell about my hand!" she whispered, entreatingly.

"I won't if you will give it to me," was the answer, in the same key.

Well—Aunt Keziah liked him, Uncle Adonijah found him suitable, and they were married on Christmas Eve—a year after her adventure "In a Pocket!"

"CLEAR AND SWEET THE NUNS ARE SINGING."

THE DREAM OF SISTER AGNES.

In the snowy moonlit midnight
  Faint and far the chimes are ringing;
In the cloister's gray old chapel
  Clear and sweet the nuns are singing;
In the shimmer of the candles,
  High above the altar, stands,
White and sad, the Christ, outstretching
  On the cross His patient hands.

And the pale Sister Agnes
Watches, with weary eyes,
Between her face and His image,
The rolling incense rise;
And she hears her own soul sobbing
As the music swells and sighs;

"The stones are cold in the chancel,
  Cold as the cruel snow;
The moon is cold in heaven—
  And the frozen earth below
Lies dead on the breast of midnight,
  Frozen to death, I know!
"Even the yellow candles
  Look cold, like those icy stars
That all night long are watching
  Beyond my window-bars;
The writhing incense shivers
  Like an outcast soul in pain—
The cold has crept into my bosom
  And wound about my brain.

"And that is why I am dreaming;
  I have forgotten the prayer,
And the faces around me waver
  Far off in the misty air,
There stands the blazing altar,
  But it is not that I see—
Only the twinkling tapers
  In the boughs of a Christmas-tree.
There hang the wreaths of holly,
  And the white-starred mistletoe,
And the shadows dart and flicker
  In the great fire's ruddy glow—
It kindles even the midnight,
  And warms the breast of the snow!

"I am dreaming—only dreaming—
  Hark! what do the voices say?
The waits sing under my window,
  Out in the dawning gray—
Singing of Bethlehem's stable,
  And the Child who was born to-day!
Or is it the nuns who are chanting,
  Chanting sweet and slow,
A rhyme of forgotten childhood,
  Lost so long ago?

"Under the holly branches,
  In the yule-log's flame and flare,
Under the Christmas tapers
  Shine the old faces fair!
Round me the warmth comes creeping
  Of arms, that clasped and clung
Stronger than arms of a mother,
  When love and dreams were young!
So warm—so strong!—they held me
  Till Death breathed cold between,
And I think I died, with the dreaming,
  And all that might have been!

"Now it is cold for ever,
  And the world lies white and dead,
With the snow for a shroud wrapped round her,
  And the stars lit at her head.
Are they stars, or the Christmas candles,
  That shine in the icy air?
The Christ from His cross has vanished
  And a little Child stands there—
Stretching His hand to lead me
  Out of the cold—ah, where?"

Clearly through the frosty silence
  In the tower the chimes are ringing;
In the gray old chapel's choir
  Loud and sweet the nuns are singing;
Only one is kneeling dumbly—
  In her wide and weary eyes,
On her lips, like marble carven,
  Death's unfathomed wonder lies—
For the mystic Guide hath led her
  Smiling, into Paradise.

"THE WAITS SING UNDER MY WINDOW."

And the pale Sister Agnes
Watches, with weary eyes,
Between her face and His image,
The rolling incense rise;
And she hears her own soul sobbing
As the music swells and sighs;

"UNDER THE CHRISTMAS TAPERS SHINE THE OLD FACES FAIR!"

"THE CHRIST FROM HIS CROSS HAS VANISHED, AND A LITTLE CHILD STANDS THERE."

Out of the gates of sunrise
  The herald dawn breaks sweet;
Over the hills and valleys
  Day comes with shining feet;
Over the heaving ocean
  And the plains of ice and snow,
And over the Holy City
  Where Christ walked long ago,
Over the eyes unseeing
  Wakens the Christmas morn—
Unto the dead and living
Stretches the Hand forgiving—
  And the Child is born!
